Many theaters are employing orchestras now that they are beginning to find favor, and if you have an orchestra in your theater, it is just as easy for them to follow that picture as it is the piano alone. They may not follow each and every movement in the picture quite as well as some of the best pianists, but if they are the right sort and class of musicians, the result can be just as satisfactory. While there is no doubt that the movements of a pianist alone are more flexible, inasmuch as he has only his own inclinations or feelings to follow,—yet at the same time, if you have the proper sort of a leader, one who understands his business, and he in turn is surrounded with capable musicians the result can be just as satisfactory as with piano and drums.

While the subject of drums is here let me say that they are of great consequence, as they are primarily the instruments of effects, and the effect is largely a matter of contrast. It is the contrast that is desired and needed to promote the realism desired. A drummer should not be over-enthusiastic in the use of his instruments, or he is liable to find when working up a "hurry" or a really big climax, that he won't have it, for the reason that he will have used up all the volume of sound before it was needed. The working up of a hurry (or any similar situation) depends entirely on watching the action in the picture, and the old rule of "piano and forte according to action" holds just as good for a pianist (or drummer) of a picture theater as well as any other.

When the picture is one of "slap-stick" comedy, it can be played just as you would handle an act in vaudeville or burlesque,—that is, insert all of the absurdities you can without overdoing it, and it will get the laughs, which is the main thing in a picture of that sort,—but please don't misconstrue my meaning and think that all comedies are of the "slap-stick" variety. The effects should follow every picture according to the nature of it, and when "Foolshead" slides down an embankment, and you hear a ripping sound, you can readily understand what is supposed to have happened. The absurd effects will cause laughter, and that is all they are supposed to do.

An organ may be used to great advantage at times in religious as well as pictures depicting sickness, poverty, death, etc., by playing suitable music and using your stops in the proper manner and working your picture up to a good climax.

YANKEE OUTING CLUB

The above cut represents a few of the genial spirits of the Yankee Company. Of course, as we understand it, only actors, their wives and sweethearts who are taking part in the company can be members, and to join the Social Club they must be, according to the qualifications for membership, a good actor and all round good fellow and able to recite the Declaration of Independence from memory. We do not know about the latter. We question if they come up to scratch if put to the test; however, those are the qualifications as we get them from Big Bill.

FROM THE OBSERVATORY

By G. F. Blaisdell

The First Methodist Episcopal Church of Sedalia, Mo., has dedicated an open-air theater—or rather annex—which adjoins its church property. The pastor, the Rev. Grant A. Robins, will conduct Sunday evening services on the plot, which is 90 x 100. He will be assisted by a chorus of fifty men. Would suggest, in case the experiment does not prove a drawing card, that the Rev. Mr. Robins try a few reels of good pictures.

The New York Post complains of the scarcity of good comedy films and fears that the source has failed. "The creator must now puzzle his brain in earnest fashion," it says, "if he would please the hardened public with a new laugh. There are few things left undone, few illusions left to be created." It is true that hearty laughter is a rare thing in a picture house these days. Such comedies as "The Monogram J. O." and "Cupid's Joke" will bring it out; so also will such Vitagraph comedies as "The New Stenographer" and "The Leading Lady."

The Rex Film Exchange, of Albany, with a capital of $25,000, has been incorporated. It is the announced intention of the company to make moving picture films. The Chicago Motion Picture Machine Company has also been incorporated, capital, $2,000.

The theater men of Milwaukee have organized the Exhibitors' League, and intend to work for better ordinances for show houses. One of the reforms adopted has been the employment of older and more responsible men.

In Essanay's "The Desert's Edge" the title screens on three occasions insists on "desparado." Also one screen describes how "The Girl Suspicions," etc., meaning, of course, suspects. Such work is not educational. Allowance is sometimes made for the blunders of foreign companies, although there is no particular reason why there should be. Certainly there is no excuse for American manufacturers.

One feature of the Essanay's recent pictures, however, shows a greater respect for the theatrical proprieties insofar that its Indians are practically naked and ride barebacked. 'Tis well. Some perfervid self-appointed censor may object to the Indian bathing suit, but no serious attention need be paid to such complaints. Let's stick for historical accuracy. Some of these days we will not see alleged army horses equipped with English saddles.

In Pathe's "Love Proves Stronger Than Duty" Ravet takes the role of a tramp, and his work is on the same high plane as his "Robert the Silent." By the way, the same company puts on in "The Accomplice" Mlle. Napierkowska, Ravet's co-worker in "Robert the Silent." On the picture screen she is in a class by herself.

A bill has been signed by the Governor of Pennsylvania which becomes a law January 1, 1912, creating a state board of censors and enumerating the fines and penalties for exhibiting a film which has not been passed upon.

It has been suggested that the easiest way for the board to work would be to come to New York and inspect the reels before they are sent out by the big agencies. This would practically eliminate the possibility of an uncensored film being shown.

An estimate of 600,000 feet of film for the photographs of the Coronation ceremonies and 10,000 000 feet to fill the orders for reels may give an idea of what an attraction the pageant really is.

It is too sad that the officials could not see their way clear to allow the companies to place the artificial lights necessary to taking pictures in the Abbey itself. They feared that some danger might be caused to the noble old structure and at the last minute withdrew their consent, consequently the pictures will not be of complete historical value.

The Commonwealth Edison Co., of Chicago, has adopted a plan for placing before the public the relative advantages and benefits of the use of electricity in domestic science. A film is shown at a local amusement park which portrays all the possible disadvantages of the use of coal in the home and the attendant satisfaction to the family on the installation of electricity in the kitchen and laundry. The commercial possibilities in this direction are infinite and it is surprising that more corporations and firms do not conduct their advertising campaigns in a like manner.

In San Francisco, Cal., an exhibitor has been fined $100 for showing a picture depicting a hold-up and a murder. The police judge held that it violated an ordinance which expressly prohibits the display of a motion picture portraying violence or murder "in such detail as to offend public morality and decency."

An appeal has been taken and the burden rests on the question of taste in the proviso. Here is an excellent opportunity to question the solidity of a statute which prohibits violence, etc., in motion pictures. On this basis, should not all works of art which show anything of a similar nature be barred? The question as to which is art a masterpiece or a series of photographic reproductions is aside from the case entirely.

Many melodramas should they be submitted to our Board of Censorship would never be shown on the boards.

Another view of the subject might be taken. Many journals of a yellow nature wildly display sketches of murder and like crimes over their principal pages with disgusting sentimentalities in the type about the actors in the tragedy. Why not be fair and muzzle these also?

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., July 4.—While the "Man in the Baths" is celebrating the natal day of these glorious United States in Little Rock, combining business with pleasure among convivial newspaper companions, I shall again endeavor to follow out his edict and supply the Moving Picture News with its weekly review from this heated section of "God's wide acres," and, Mr. Editor, if you are sweltering in dear little old New York town, just try and believe that the atmosphere there is as a refreshing zephyr to the humidity scorching us in the "valley of vapors," for such is the case.

Well, we had the great pictures of the recent Confederate reunion at Little Rock, and the Princess Theater scored a beat on their colleagues by being the first house in this city to exhibit this feature. I didn't get to Little Rock to view the pageant at that time, and after seeing the pictures I am just as well satisfied that I remained out of the crush, for the scene on the picture sheet at the Princess depicted all that I could have seen at that time, so, figuratively speaking, I am money in on my absence.

Let me state that the pictures are excellent; there was not, it seemed, a feature that the camera overlooked, and all things of interest seemed to be included. Every detail of the great reunion, which is truly significant of "the passing of the Gray of the Southland," was shown. The audience had an opportunity of looking at those brave men who were such important factors in that memorable struggle, and, being "south born" and raised in the vicinity of New Orleans, of southern parents, I naturally had a soft spot in my heart for their lost cause. The pictures were further enhanced by the excellent lecture given by Col. William Lightfoot Visscher, the Kentucky orator, known from east to west. Between reels the Twin City quartette rendered several appropriate selections. The pictures of the Confederate reunion will go from here on a tour through the West and Southwest, visiting Memphis, New Orleans, Dallas, Fort Worth and as far west as California. They are excellent.

Among the pictures here this week was a Rex, "Called Back," which, though issued May 25th, was still in excellent condition. I take issue with Rex, however, and question the wisdom of making one of the characters in the picture as bad as it was shown. Rex, thou art "King." Your name signifies as much, but the actress in that picture was unworthy a king. The rest of the picture, Rex, was immense, and the forest fire, together with the masterful work of the wife and the effort of the husband when he realized his wife and child were in danger was excellent. It was a most worthy reel with the exception aforementioned; but try and remember in the future when the product of the scenario factory shows an actress in a bad light that the "sister" could just as easily come from "the ladies sewing circle" or "foreign missionary board."

There is another fault that is so prevalent and seems so useless. It is that of letter writing. I have seen women in moving pictures seize pencil or pen and draw with great rapidity one straight line after another, dashing across the surface of the paper, and a minute later hold up a marvel in composition. When you write letters, girls, WRITE THEM, please. Also noted this week in two different pictures a lack of proper attention to undergarments worn by ladies before the camera. One woman was a member of an Independent company and another was with the Trust side of the industry. What's the matter, ladies? Have they quit selling safety pins in your territory?

For those who enjoy pictures of that nature, of which, however, I don't happen to be one, "The Human Tigress" seemed to please, and the progressive American with its "Flying A." Champion's reel, "Molly Pitcher," pleased, even if "Molly" didn't quite grasp all the possibilities of the part.

Imp delighted the audiences with its "Forged Dispatch," though it did seem remarkable that the document that caused so much suffering should have remained undiscovered all those years. However, we forgive this dramatic license, or the taking advantage of it in the manner it was done, for the general worth of the picture, especially the old veterans' parade, which was most realistic. Lux, with you we enjoyed that "Walk in Tunis," and was greatly pleased with the little Indian girl's work in the Bison reel, "A Squaw's Retribution." I think that particular maiden has shown wonderful improvement in her work, her expression being excellent. Powers certainly sent us a picturesque folly in "Smith's Marmalade" and the audience enjoyed it, and three Thanhouser reels that caught on heavily here during the week were "The Pillars of Society," a most worthy production; "Motoring," a delightful romance, and "Flames and Fortune." Thanhouser posters are always the signal for good business.

For about the "steenth" time the Essanay reel "The Lure of the City," which is now some two months old, came to one of the Trust houses, and the more I look at this reel the less I think of it. I wonder if the man who staged that drama realized that the "little sister," who, by the way, was most brazen for a country girl, never changed her dress during the entire reel. She was about the fastest bit of femininity from rural precincts that I have yet looked at on a picture sheet and it is a relief to know we don't meet her kind often. "Her Brother's Photograph," an Edison picture, was greatly enjoyed and the little leading lady of this reel is one of the most popular picture actresses that visits Hot Springs. "Proving His Love," a Vitagraph, was also very good, aside from the defects where journalism was concerned. The "interview" the reporter got was entirely too brief, and when he returned to write the story he should have used, considering these modern days of progressive newspaper work, his typewriter. Furthermore, he could not have written more than a "stick" of copy. The "heart interest" features, however, were excellent, and Miss Turner was charming.

In conclusion, I am going to risk a suggestion to Mr. Saunders as a future feature of the Moving Picture News, and that is that he invite from the men and women now acting in the various picture companies a story each week of some important thing that has been noted by them of human interest, either at rehearsals or when the pictures were being taken. There isn't a one of us engaged in theatrical work but who has had a world of "experiences" come to us; not one of us but who can relate some little incident that is most interesting, and I think that if a story of this nature was published each week, written by the people who act in the pictures, that it would be of great interest to the trade generally. What a field it opens for ye press agent, provided the ladies and gentlemen are too busy to write or care to entrust their recital to more competent hands. Now, if it gets an official O. K., who will be the first?

THE LADY IN THE BATHS.

We fully agree with "The Lady in the Baths" in her last paragraph and will willingly open our columns for experiences of such nature, and further will pay for them if the writers so desire. As a leader of what she would like to see, suppose "The Lady" starts off.—Ed. M. P. N.

OUR LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT

June 29, 1911.

Adam Dixon Warner, who has lectured throughout the United States, has taken moving pictures of some of the most beautiful spots in Los Angeles to illustrate his course of lectures, "See America First." Using an automobile part of the time and a special car the rest of the time, with his moving picture camera along with him, Mr. Warner took views of the business streets, parks and the boulevards. These pictures will be shown at the Auditorium after which they will be shown all over the country. In conjunction with the local views, Mr. Warner has secured pictures of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, Colorado, Alaska and the Hudson River.

Ralph Lane, a graduate of Berkeley University, has obtained a number of stereopticon views of the Los Angeles aqueduct and is now exhibiting them at a local theater, accompanied by a lecture. Mr. Lane has traveled all over the country, lecturing on various subjects, and is in a position to do justice to his present subject.

The Ideal, Spring near Fourth, is advertising that they are showing pictures of the Coronation of King George V. Numerous posters adorn the exterior of the theater, declaring that they are showing the Coronation as a special feature. That this must be a fake, everyone but the dear public knows. Yet nothing is being done to stop them. Of course, a great many exhibitors are indignant, declaring that it is ruining the business, but the pictures are still being shown. On investigation, the picture disclosed itself to be the funeral of King Edward VII with the casket scenes cut out and various subtitles introduced here and there. The picture is the Imp release of the funeral and is still in good condition.

The Optic, Main between Fifth and Sixth, is showing three first-run Trust releases for five cents. There are no ten cent seats in the house any more, and vaudeville has been cut out. When the General Film Company invaded this city, the first rule they made was that no five cent house would be allowed to show any first-run pictures. Have they revoked that rule hoping, perhaps, to get back some of their fast departing customers?

The entire contents of the Florodora, 115 East First, was sold by auction this morning. The following articles were among those sold: 200 folding chairs, an electric piano player, four fans, a No. 6 Powers machine with a rheostat, an electric sign and some lamps. The contents were valued at about $3,000.

The European, corner First and Wilmington, has been sold to Weiss & Silver, who are going to make a Jewish vaudeville and moving picture house out of it. Hand bills have been thrown broadcast, announcing that well-known New York artists will appear. Admission will be ten cents.

The Lyric, Spring near First, starting Monday, will run Independent pictures. The house is practically a new one and has shown Trust pictures since it opened. Vaudeville and pictures are shown. Admission is ten cents while the vaudeville is being shown and five cents for the pictures alone.

The Pearl, First near Alameda, running Trust pictures heretofore, will show Independent releases beginning Monday. Pictures will be changed three times a week instead of two as heretofore. The house caters to the working class.

The proprietors of the Bijou, Main and Sixth, were the hosts to-day of the local branch of the Boy Scouts of America. The Examiner newsboys were also admitted free. To celebrate the occasion, the Champion release entitled "The Boy Scouts of America to the Rescue" was shown.

The Family, Main near Fifth, is dark. The lease has expired and the proprietors, Kerr and Watkins, declare that the owner asks a prohibitive price for the renewal of the lease. Mr. Kerr states he is going to San Bernardino, where he is going to open another up-to-date moving picture house.

The Novelty, Main near First, has been purchased by the Quinn Bros., proprietors of the Bijou. The house has been a failure so far. Trust pictures are being shown.

Mr. Dawes, local manager of Miles Bros. Exchange, has returned from San Francisco. He declares that he has obtained three more releases a week which will make a total of twelve releases a week received here. The exchange will not handle the Bison and Champion films as much as it did heretofore. Mr. Dawes declares the people are getting tired of these so-called Western stories.

The number of reels released by the California Film Exchange will be twelve a week hereafter, according to Mr. Marcowitz, local manager for the exchange. Mr. Marcowitz has just returned from San Francisco, where he went to try to induce the main office to send more comedy here. He reports that he was successful and that the exhibitors will have no more cause for complaint.

The Star, Fifth near Main, has again opened with Independent pictures. C. M. Harr is the proprietor. Although located in a good thoroughfare, the house, for some reason or other, has been a hoodoo. Mr. Harr says he is going to remove the hoodoo.

Butler's, Hill near Sixth, has closed for an indefinite length of time. Poor business is given as the reason for closing. Second-run Trust pictures were used.

Santa Anna is to have a new theater which will be known as the Mirror. The house will seat 400 and will show four reels of Independent pictures and two illustrated songs. The price of admission will be 10, 15 and 20 cents. F. H. Fowler is the proprietor.

The Auditorium at San Pedro is now showing Independent pictures.

WASHINGTON LETTER

Washington, D. C.

The Coronation of King George V. and Queen Mary has taken the Capital City by storm. Few films have been in greater demand or more eagerly sought by the public. In order to give the officials the benefit of a cinemotographic view of this great event Mr. Brylawski secured this reel for the British Embassy, and there was invited for this exhibition diplomats. Cabinet officers, officials, and President Taft himself.

The presentation of The Coronation at the Empress, under the management of Marcus Notes, created quite a sensation. As fast as train and messenger could bring this film to Washington it was shown at the Empress, making record-breaking time from the Mauretania and appearing on the screen at 1.18 p. m. It is reported that the Empress made the first presentation of the Independent reel, not excepting New York.

Another theater which showed the Coronation on the first day of its release was the Virginia, under Manager Noonan. Orchestral music added much to the setting of this film, that has the power of making the stay-at-homes know just what the Coronation was like. The playing of coronation and triumphial marches from the operas, as well as "God Save the King" during the passing of King George's coach were most appropriate.

The Colonial, under Manager Brylawski, arranged to exhibit the Coronation Ceremonies for a week in order that its many patrons will have the opportunity of seeing this great event. A fitting decoration is here observed in the hanging of British and American flags before the Colonial.

The Columbia Theater, one of our first-class dramatic houses, gave a series of travel pictures, which lasted for about two and a half hours, for which prices ranged from 25 cents to 50 cents. The fact that this theater could be filled at this price with the many five and ten-cent shows in the city, demonstrates the popularity of motion pictures. The reel which formed the chief attraction was the Coronation of King George and Queen Mary. This is not the first time that the Columbia has had crowded houses at high prices for moving pictures. During the past season it had several different series of travelogues in motion picture form, all of which brought capacity houses. These were sought by educators, officials, and social leaders.

La Grand Park, one of our open-air theaters, made a big success of its run of the Coronation reel for two days. Manager Crandall is one of the most particular men in the airdrome business. He is almost a crank about clean seats, dust-laid ground, no-smoking, and proper courtesy. He has even widened his side aisles, so that mothers may have their baby carriages beside them, instead of leaving the go-cart at the rear of the park and the mother being tired holding the infant. In place of using overhead lights Mr. Crandall has his illumination at the side, with appropriate red lights for exits. Ice-water is furnished free, with about a dozen cups on hand, so as to prevent "waiting." Mr. Crandall employs an excellent pianist, who knows his business in following the pictures. The La Grand was formerly an Association client, but on account of not being able to get what he was paying for from the General Film Co., it turned Independent and Manager Crandall rejoices in his change.

The Thanhouser Company released "Lorna Doone" on June 30 and as usual the Empress secured it on the day of release. This timely showing had a particular significance in the National Capital, because the dramatization of Blackmore's famous novel has been recently accomplished by the playwright, Willard Holcomb, while the play was given its initial performance at the Belasco Theater on July 3, by the Vagabond Players and will run the entire week. It has met with great success, but many people of Washington took the opportunity of seeing Lorna Doone in the motion picture form in order to get a scenario idea of the novel. Other houses used this reel during the week. It is not often that a photoplay and a real drama make initial performances at the same time.

The Capital City Park, which recently entered the motion picture arena, is under the able management of Mr. Dexter. It uses Independent material and is gaining in popularity each week. The park suffered some damage during a recent hail storm, but it was O. K. for the night's performance.

A recent conversation with Manager Morgan of the Princess demonstrated the popularity of the Independent films in the northeast section of the city. The house has lately become a convert to the Independents and the manager was most enthusiastic over his service and the films. He even declared that his business had increased.

LONDON NOTES

It is the eve of Coronation day. Everything and everybody is in readiness for filming the great event. As I write, the weather looks anything from promising, but there are indications of improvement. Although the Office of Works have granted the operators every facility, and are providing them with several places on the government stands, the ambitious project of filming the actual crowning ceremony within Westminster Abbey has been abandoned. The authorities, I understand, were agreeable, but it was found that a special lighting installation would be necessary which might damage the Abbey structure, and the plan had, therefore, to be dropped.

The Globe Film Company, Limited, whose premises in Cecil Court were destroyed by fire, have negotiated for and acquired the spacious and sumptuous premises of the American Film Trading Co., Ltd., of 81-83 Shaftesbury avenue, W., where they will take possession and carry on their business from their new address some time in July, or as soon as the necessary alterations are completed. It should be emphasized that the Globe have not acquired the business of the American Film Trading Co., but merely the premises.

In addition to the "Kinemacolor" pictures, Mr. Chas. Urban is presenting a short but interesting dramatic playlet entitled "Before the Dawn" at the Scala Theater. It is an Eastern military episode, pre-supposing a similar state of affairs in the East to-day to that which existed during the mutiny in 1857. Of course, in this busy Coronation season the inclusion of fresh topical films is frequent, while standing features include "Sunstars," "Derby," "Empire Day in Hyde Park," "The Birth of Flowers" and the magnificent scenes of His Majesty unveiling the Victoria Memorial. Exclusive pictures of the grand horse show at Richmond are a special feature.

The topical film is the subject of much discussion on this side at the moment. The sentiments expressed in an Irish evening journal, having an enormous circulation, proves interesting reading.

"No mechanical device, however ingeniously contrived, however popularly eulogized, can be presumed to supplant the empire of flesh and blood, of voice, character, and vital emotional presentation. The kinematograph must remain spectacular. Its limitations must obviate any acute development. Its instructive potentialities appear to be more in the direction of science than of drama. The mobility of its sequacious photography has been proved to be of considerable utility in observing and reproducing various processes and phenomena. The kinematograph has besides to combat an internal peril. Its market is so colossal, and the public demand so voracious, that the quality of the production tends to become stereotyped and depreciated. Some of its drama is positively incoherent. It has neither head nor tail; it is all amorphous body. The comedy lends itself to a parade of athletic rough and tumble, and has not evoked a 'high consciousness.' The 'Woolly West' figures ad infinitum but it is quite pleasant and exciting. Curiously enough, some of the acting, in spite of its hastiness and lack of finish, is very presentable, and has occasional poignancy. But, speaking generally, there is a pressing need all over the United Kingdom for diversity of theme and interest. Without that what has sprung up like a mushroom in the morning must inevitably be withered at eve. When the primal attractiveness has flagged, what has the kinematograph in reserve for the lean years? At present, public demand goes in the direction of representation of contemporaneous events. The funeral of King Edward VII. gave the kinema men a great chance, and the Coronation procession will give them a greater one. A Derby struggle, or a Cup Final, or a 'Varsity boat race—these are the things which the people like to see, and it seems to us that the success of the kinematograph will depend on catering for the public by a constant supply of films presenting those things which people talk most of from day to day. The kinematograph is verily a reproduction of the parable of the mustard seed."

That political parties are recognizing the value of the motion picture as a means of propagating their views is emphasized by the fact that a film dealing with woman suffrage is in preparation. The play has been written and acted by several prominent actresses and enthusiasts in the cause, and will be produced by the Barker Motion Photography, Ltd. The film, which is entitled "True Womanhood," sets forth the trials of a "sweated" woman worker, for whom, owing to the intemperate habits of her husband, there is nothing left but the workhouse. She is saved, however, by a suffragette, who comes as a fairy godmother to the unhappy woman and brings about a reconciliation between the husband and wife, and assists them to a fresh start in life. Two of the scenes represent a "poster parade" of suffragettes, advertising last Saturday's great procession, and a mass meeting at election time, addressed by a politician, who is interrupted by a suffragette, and the ejection of the latter.

The enormous growth of the cinematograph theater in the area of the London County Council is seen from a glance at the statistics for the quarter ending March 31st last. The number of renewals of licenses granted was 124, the new licenses nine, for premises licensed for music, and 131 renewals and seventeen new licenses for premises without a music license. The fees received for licenses and transfers were £248 10s. and fifty-seven occasional exhibitions were given during the quarter.

Excellent pictures of the historic ceremony at Windsor—the Investiture of the Prince of Wales with the Order of the Garter—were secured by all of our "topical" producers. The "Kinemacolor" representation, which is now being exhibited at the Mr. Chas. Urban's Scala Theater, merits special mention. The magnificent regalia worn by the royal personages and the picturesque surroundings of the grounds combine to make this subject one of great beauty and historical interest.

London, June 21. L. D.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT

June 22, 1911.

I regret to have to report the death on Saturday, June 17th, last, at his residence at Southfield, London, of Mr. Thomas Clegg, whose name, through its association with the vigorous campaign prosecuted by Mr. Chas. Urban in the field of educational kinematography, must be almost as well known on your side as in England. Mr. Clegg gained his first introduction to the trade in 1905, when he joined Mr. Urban at the latter's old establishment in Rupert street. He previously had a wide experience in the journalistic, literary and secretarial fields, and his uncommon merits as a writer were employed constantly for some time in pressing the claims of the educational picture. His association with Mr. Urban was a peculiarly happy one; they were equally enthusiastic believers in the future of the educational picture in the face of innumerable discouragements, and Mr. Urban could have found no one to give more powerful expression to his ideas. In my opinion the educational pamphlets and catalogues which Mr. Clegg prepared for Mr. Urban marked the high-water mark of kinematograph journalism. Undoubtedly, when the educational picture comes into its own, as it must in due course do, it will be to no small extent as a result of Mr. Clegg's untiring efforts. His death will, however, be regretted just as much on personal grounds, and by no one more than by those who, like the writer, were brought into contact with him in their capacity as pressmen, whose work he invariably did everything possible to expedite and make pleasant. In that capacity the writer made his acquaintance during his first week with Mr. Urban and it was maintained during his period of service at Urbanora House, Kinemacolor Building and later with the Sacred & Educational Animated Picture Co. His health, bad for some time, broke down completely shortly after he joined the latter company and he had been confined to the house for a fortnight before his death, which bereaves a wife and two young children.

I am writing these notes on the morning of Coronation day and the conditions are certainly none too favorable from the photographic point of view. The weather, after six weeks of uninterrupted sunshine, broke just when it was most desired that it would and keep up after the way of English weather, and the sun this morning is conspicuous by its absence and at the time of writing, when the procession is actually passing through the streets, rain is threatening. Whether it falls or not we can hardly expect such first-class quality as in the pictures of the late king's funeral. As to the actual merits of the various pictures, I must delay advising you until my next letter. By the way, in order to be on the spot at the earliest possible moment, the entire Barker photographic staff slept last night in beds specially installed in the offices of the company, which they will also use during the next few days. None of their homes will know them until Monday next at the earliest. A large number of theaters will be showing the procession to-night and they should do phenomenal business if the rain comes to drive the people from the sheets and of the illuminations.

Some confusion seems to exist in the minds of members of the trade on your side between the Chas. Urban Trading Co., Ltd., Kineto, Ltd., and the Natural Color Kinematograph Co., Ltd. The first named is the company originally founded by Mr. Chas. Urban in Rupert street, but with which he severed his connection some two years or so ago. It is now devoted to the sale in this country of the productions of the Eclipse Co., of Paris, while Mr. Urban's activities are confined to the other two companies mentioned, of which Kineto, Ltd., produces black and white pictures, including many topicals and the Natural Color Co. the "Kinemacolor" films. Perhaps this statement may clear up any confusion which exists between these distinct organizations.

While mentioning the Chas. Urban Trading Co., I may allude to the excellent quality which invariably marks their productions and to the interest of the many "national" subjects which they issue and the beauty of the scenic settings with which their dramas are furnished. Pictures are nowhere seen in greater comfort or to better advantage than in the comfortable projecting room at Urbanora House, which created something of a sensation when it was first opened; at that time we mostly saw films projected on the walls of the makers' offices, hastily converted into a projecting theater by drawing a blind to the considerable inconvenience of the typist, whose work had perforce to be suspended until the seance was over. Now, as I explained in a previous letter, we are much more luxurious and Urbanora House may be said to have set the new fashion.

The "Kinematograph Weekly," which produces a special Coronation issue next week, announces as one of the features a discussion "Is the Renter an Essential Factor," and if the contributors are candid enough to state their real opinion we should have some interesting reading. Not so long ago to mention the word "renter" to some of the film makers was like waving a red flag before a bull. In those days there was no doubt that a majority of the makers would have voted for his extinction; in fact, the Paris convention was mainly devised to bring that end about and it was the powerful fight put up by the renters for the maintenance of their business existence, added to dissensions among the makers themselves, that brought that fine idea to the ground. Since that time the attitude of the producers towards the renter has somewhat altered. There is no doubt that three or four years ago the middleman was getting all the pickings of the trade; at the present time, however, he probably makes less than either the maker or the showman and renting is generally regarded as a thankless and profitless field to engage in. On the face of it, it would appear as if no third person were necessary to intervene between the maker of films, the source of supply, the showman and the user, but in practice the present system has much to recommend it, and not the least is the fact that those manufacturers who have taken up renting have gradually come to be renters almost solely to the practical extinction of their producing business. The two parts of the business seem best worked independently and while things go on as at present, there is not likely to be any alteration. What is wanted in many cases are film buyers with higher qualifications.

I notice our old friend, Walter Reynolds, L. C. C., is also scheduled to contribute to the same publication on the probable lines of future L. C. C. kinematograph legislation. As a member of the Theaters and Music Halls Committee of that body, Mr. Reynolds should know a thing or two as to future events and his article should make interesting reading. Let's hope, however, he has nothing in store for us like the extinguisher he once produced as a sure cure for kinematograph conflagrations, but which, amid the ribald laughter of every film man in the land, went down to oblivion after a demonstration at the London Hippodrome, at which its shortcomings were exposed by Mr. R. W. Paul in a manner which makes one's sides ache merely to remember. However, that's a story which may be told on another occasion.

"A DARING DEED," CHAMPION RELEASE JULY 19
BREAKING INTO THE FREIGHT HOUSE

SEEKING A NEW NAME

Realizing the difficulties attendant upon not having a suitable name for a brand of moving picture film, a manufacturer has turned this week to our advertising columns to assist him in this important feature of launching a new brand of film. The manufacturers in question will have the facility for turning out a high-class product, their intention being to produce two regular releases each week, one of popular drama or novelty and the other educational. There have been several cases of a party winning prizes of this character and no doubt a number of those who will read advertisements of this enterprising manufacturer will hit upon names that will have the proper swing and meet all the other requirements as briefly outlined in the advertisement. We know we have many clever readers and among them those to whom matters of this kind come as an inspiration, so let your fancies soar and come back with a prize winning idea.

"The New Congressman," a recent Yankee release embodied several scenes in Washington, D. C., in which society personages appear as an ensemble. The Yankee Film Company arranged with a number of prominent society ladies and gentlemen to appear in this production, among which is an Austrian Countess. By request the name is withheld. This simply illustrates the Yankee's progressive methods for detail.

A YANKEE "BEAT"

Characteristic of the Yankee progressiveness: They have again obtained a special "beat" by securing 1,400 feet of scenes in and about the largest ship in the world—the Olympic of the White Star Line, on her maiden voyage to Europe.

The importance of this film cannot be overestimated, as few were the fortunate ones who obtained a glimpse of this magnificent ocean greyhound.

We understand that only 450 feet of this educational subject will be used in conjunction with a comedy that will make up a full reel. So little is known or seen of these floating palaces that its gigantic proportions will prove a great surprise to those who have no idea of the wonders on shipboard. In all, there are over 16 scenes, including views of preparations before leaving—the film having been taken fifteen minutes before sailing time, when there were almost four thousand human beings on board.

Films of this class add prestige and dignity to the M. P. industry and will undoubtedly call forth the unstinted praise of the trade for educational films.

This film will be released Friday, July 21st, and will be called "The Giant of the Ocean."

SOLAX FORT MEYER PICTURES

When in the office of the Solax Company the other day we got a better insight into the importance of their operations at Fort Meyer. It seems that when they secured permission from the Fort to take these Military pictures and work out some high-class military stories it was their intention to put them out as special releases. On second thought they have, however, decided in order to boom their summer business to put them in their regular releases. This is going to give the exhibitor a big series of special features.

A TENDERFOOT

A Comedy of Life on the Cattle Ranches for Production by Moving Photographs
By Morrill Hazard

(Copyright by Alfred H. Saunders)

May 15, 1911.

SYNOPSIS

In this comedy Chauncey Brook, a young man from the East, appears at the Square Moon ranch to apply for employment. The foreman refuses application and concocts a scheme to rob Chauncey of the little money he has. With confederates, Terror Jake inveigles the tenderfoot into a poker game and fleeces him.

Later the same crowd, seeking to humiliate Chauncey still further, challenge him to fight their favorite pugilist. Chauncey defeats their man and wins the heart of Miss Burke, owner of the ranch, her father disapproves and when Chauncey leaves she goes forth also.

Miss Burke overtakes Chauncey and advises him how to get employment. Accordingly he goes to Diamond A Ranch and startles the owner and his cowboys by his rough demeanor. When he asks for work they make game of him by handing him a lasso to use. He fails. They give him a quirt to drive cows with. He goes away on foot and cows chase him. He is rescued by Miss Burke.

She tells him she has bought the Heart and Arrow Ranch, shows him how to use the lasso. He surprises Diamond A cowboys by his sudden knowledge. They make him ride unbroken broncho.

Broncho, running away, carries Chauncey to Miss Burke's Heart and Arrow Ranch. A great stampede has been started by the broncho. Chauncey stops the stampede on a motorcycle and becomes a hero.

Jim Burke permits Tenderfoot to marry his daughter.

Scene I.

Enlarged sign, "Square Moon Ranch (Moon)," followed by cowboy camp.

Discovered playing poker around a tree stump; Terror Jake, foreman and two cowboys.

Enter Chauncey Brook, a tenderfoot in Eastern garb. He carries a suitcase. After surveying scene he interrupts game and accosts Terror Jake. He is asking for work. Terror scornfully waves him away. Chauncey leaves picture, discouraged.

Terror propounds scheme to follow Chauncey and inveigle him into poker. They go away to work the scheme, laughing.

Scene II.

Exterior of Purple Pup saloon. Cowboy loungers discovered.

Terror Jake and loungers arrive, tell of their scheme and point to prospective victim, who is approaching in the distance. All exult.

Enter Chauncey. They invite him to play poker. He examines his cash dubiously. He accepts invitation. Terror Jake conducts him into saloon and the others follow, mocking him.

Scene III.

Interior of saloon. Discovered: all the characters of preceding scenes. Chauncey, Terror Jake and companions are playing poker. Chauncey's adversaries cheat outrageously. He cannot understand their constant laughter. Ad lib.

Chauncey is fleeced and leaves saloon pursued by hoarse guffaws. They divide his money. They decide to follow him. Exeunt en masse with a new scheme.

Scene IV.

Same as Scene II. Chauncey discovered in quandary.

Terror Jake and party come out of saloon. Terror offers Chauncey a banknote, stipulating that he must enter prize ring to get it. Chauncey hesitates, but his poverty brings him to terms and he accepts challenge. They jeer.

Terror Jake carries Chauncey away to prepare for the battle.

One of the cowboys is an expert boxer. He amuses the others by showing what he will do to Chauncey.

They follow the victim happily.

Scene V.

Same as Scene I. Roped arena in foreground. Discovered: cowboy pugilist and second in arena, waiting for victim; also crowd of cowboy spectators.

Enter Miss Burke, lovely, college-bred, to see fight. She is welcomed. They show her father approaching and advise her to go.

Enter Jim Burke, proprietor of Square Moon Ranch. He criticizes daughter for presence at prize fight. She insists upon seeing it.

Pugilist's second consults watch. Chauncey is seen approaching.

Enter Terror Jake and Chauncey in ring costume. Crowd laughs. Miss Burke recalls that she has met Chauncey but does not speak to him.

Chauncey and Terror enter ring. Battle proceeds. Chauncey knocks out pugilist. Miss Burke is glad. She goes to him and pins a flower on his coat, which he has slipped into. Exit Miss Burke, followed by angry father.

Chauncey kisses the flower.

Terror reluctantly pays stake.

Exit Chauncey.

Terror Jake and crowd gloomily compare notes and go away disgusted.

Scene VI.

A romantic spot.

Miss Burke appears on her horse and dismounts.

Enter Chauncey. They converse and shake hands. It is a tryst. He still has flower and kisses it. He offers her a ring. She accepts.

Jim Burke comes on scene unperceived and watches them.

Exit Chauncey.

Burke can scarcely restrain himself. He assails his daughter, demanding her to alter her conduct or leave. She says she will leave and they part in anger. Exit Burke.

Miss Burke thinks, mounts horse and rides after Chauncey.

Scene VII.

A road.

Chauncey, travel-stained and weary, appears and sits down to rest. He is sadly discouraged and has only his flower for comfort. Suddenly he jumps up joyfully, seeing Miss Burke riding toward him.

She dismounts, cheers him up and directs him where to go.

Chauncey takes heart and trudges on. Miss Burke, after bidding him farewell, mounts horse and watches him go.

Scene VIII.

An enlarged sign, "Diamond A Ranch (A)," followed by ranch scene. Joe Ray, proprietor, and several cowboys discovered. They are dismounting after a hard ride and throw themselves down to rest.

Enter Chauncey, surveys formidable gathering with misgiving, decides to address himself to one of the group. Thinking a tough demeanor will make a favorable impression, he hits his man a blow on the back with violent familiarity. Offers to shake hands. Victim dumbfounded, calls Joe.

Joe steps forward and surveys Chauncey with curiosity, then makes a comedy gesture of disapproval. He is walking away when Chauncey suddenly grabs him and whirls him around, then folds his arms. Joe stoops down with hands on knees to inspect Chauncey. All the others do the same.

Chauncey, speaking to assemblage, demands work. Joe is relieved. He thought Chauncey was a lunatic—and so did all.

Joe says there is plenty of work. Chauncey is glad. Joe gives Chauncey a lasso and tells him to lasso something. Chauncey does not know what it is for. Cowboy illustrates lasso throwing by lassoing Chauncey, who then tries to lasso cowboy, failing ignominiously. Chauncey is so tangled in lasso that they are obliged to rescue him. Ad lib.

Joe, in disgust, takes away lasso, gives Chauncey a quirt and tells him to go after cows.

Chauncey starts away to make good. Exit.

Joe and cowboys agree on a joke, mount horses and gallop away. Exeunt.

Scene IX.

Enlarged sign: "Heart and Arrow Ranch (Heart and Arrow)—For Sale"; followed by road scene.

Miss Burke appears, surveys country by standing in stirrups, is satisfied, hails somebody afar.

Enter ranchman to Miss Burke, who asks if he is owner. He is. She asks what he wants for ranch. He holds up ten fingers—ten thousand dollars. She pays on account.

Miss Burke rides on her way rejoicing. Ranchman counts money, exulting.

Scene X.

Herd of cattle on Diamond A Ranch.

Chauncey, with quirt, appears on foot and attempt to drive cattle with quirt.

THE VAGABOND
Release July 13th

It is always refreshing to learn that a man who once made a mistake, or several mistakes, can rise above them and prove to the world that faith is never entirely misplaced in one. George Hopkins, the vagabond, strolls over to the veranda of Editor Lee's home, where the editor and Mrs. Lee and their daughter are having their tea. He glances at the repast with such longing eyes that the editor bids him come nearer. He tells the editor he is hungry, and they offer him a seat and some refreshments. He gets a position as typesetter in Editor Lee's newspaper office, but the foreman continually finds fault with him.

Once, after rather a serious mistake has occurred through the inaptitude of the vagabond, the foreman discharges him. The editor's daughter happens to be in the office at the time and she tries to clear the vagabond, and she bids him good-bye and good cheer, and while her hand is extended the vagabond takes her handkerchief and puts it into his bosom pocket for a keepsake.

He walks down to the general store, where he finds an excited group discussing a notice in the paper against the night riders who are infesting the district. He asks the storekeeper for work, but is refused. One of the group of night riders walks over to him and asks that he join their band. He is told he can avenge himself upon both the editor and the storekeeper. The vagabond, with good intentions, decides to join the riders and discover their secrets and hiding places. He is taken to the riders' camp and sworn in as one of them. He is given a horse and that night with the rest of the band he rides up to attack the general storekeeper. In the confusion, the vagabond finds it possible to slip away and runs off undetected and informs the editor of the coming attack upon his home. He begs Editor Lee to flee and taking his cap and coat sits in the editor's chair to await the coming of the desperados. They circle the house and through the windows fire at him. Thinking they have shot the editor they disperse, but the next morning the household find the body of the faithful vagabond riddled with bullets and holding in his hand the handkerchief of Miss Lee and the list of names of the night riders.

A SOUTHERN GIRL'S HEROISM
Champion Release July 10th

Here is a story in which is presented the charge and countercharge of madly rushing troops, in which we see the cannon's flaring mouth — the bursting shells hurtling through the air, sending men on all sides down in the throes of death. Here are galloping officers giving their orders through all these scenes of frightful carnage—such a picture with no other lure than the fascination which comes from the witnessing of such heroic incidents is the one here presented as a "Southern Girl's Heroism."

The story in question in brief is as follows: The Confederate, General Pleasanton, is a stern disciplinarian and strong southern partisan. George Lawrence, though a southern born, is a Unionist in principle and dons the Federal uniform and with it on calls at the general's house, for he is the sweetheart of the latter's daughter.

Lucy, the sweetheart, strong southern girl that she is, is shocked at this, but love finally triumphs over loyal sentiment and she sinks sobbing on her sweetheart's breast. Just then her father, the general, comes in and discovering the state of affairs orders George from his house forever.

George goes, but soon he finds his way back to the arms of his beloved one, but unluckily for him the irate father chances again upon the scene, this time accompanied by some of his officers and soldiers. George has barely time to hide behind a large mirror as the general greets his daughter. The suspense of this scene may well be imagined, but George is discovered, put under arrest and locked a prisoner in the cellar. He is further humiliated by having a gunny sack tied over his head and shoulders—to remain there until his execution next morning.

That supreme moment arrives, but Lucy is there pleading with her father, who refuses to be swayed from his purpose; but he grants her one request, notwithstanding, the removal of the sack. This is done and lo! and behold! there stands—not George—O, no—but the negro wench Eliza! The general is, of course, filled with surprise and consternation, though the observer is not, having seen how Lucy and the faithful Eliza a few hours before had accomplished this daring task, thus giving to George his life and liberty.

Although George had himself gallantly saved the general's life, yet that man with adamantine heart is against him. In the early part of the war this took place—George actually nursing him back to life in his own tent. This incident, with many others to which we can hardly give passing reference, together with George's manly love-making and final triumph, constitutes this film presentation to be one of the very best of its kind.

A DARING DEED
Champion Release July 19th

The opening scene is a typical Western railroad station, weighing scales, shovel, picks and mining tools generally are scattered around, for this is a mining district. William Carver, as station agent, is there in course of work. Here comes a young bank messenger with bullion glittering gold dust and nuggets, but Bill marks down casually on the waybill as though it were sixty cents worth. But withal Bill is big and lusty with iron nerve. Quite different is the next arrival, which is a dead-box escorted by a quota of mourners, who solemnly give prayer, although they are rather rough individuals, and they sorrowfully depart.

Before closing the station for the night, Bill wires a good night message to his little sweetheart, who is the telegraph operator at Silver Springs station. It is well that such is the circumstance for an unusual thing occurs. We see the lid of the dead-box rise, higher and higher until we look into two baleful eyes. What can this mean? Is it a plot? Bill's eyes open and see what we see. At once his alert mind operates. With a bound he is on the box, depressing the lid, then drags a heavy crate to hold it down, together with every other solid object.

From without comes sounds from those erstwhile mourners who are determined to force an entrance. Bill barricades the entrance and flies to his faithful ticker and click, click, goes a message to his sweetheart. At first no response and untold suspense. She has just arrived and now comes the welcome answer. Leaving her father to continue the conversation over wire, she mounts her horse and dashes off.

A dance is in progress at Bud's Dance Hall. Right into its midst rides this little heroine. She tells her story, and in a jiffy these rough riders of the plains are off on a mission of succor; and none too soon do they arrive, for those bold, rough miners have succeeded in breaking down the barricade, and Bill is now engaged in a deadly struggle with them. A shot rings out and one of the assailants is in death's halls. Then the cowboys burst in, and the rest may well be imagined. From out of the box the now "almost a corpse" is taken and he is marched off with the others, while Bill and his little girl are clasped in love's embrace.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

Yankee Film Co. Release July 17th

Pretty Maggie Dolan had given her final answer to Jim, her childhood sweetheart, that unless he abstained from the use of liquor she would never marry him.

Jim's faithful promise was soon broken, as he came among a crowd of his boon companions. Upon calling for Maggie that evening at the bank where she was employed, his free use of the "cup that cheers" was very noticeable. When Maggie refused his escort, he became abusive and received a thrashing at the hands of Tom Bell, the teller of the bank.

When Maggie marries Tom, Jim, contrary to all expectations, becomes a respected citizen and eventually one of the chief detectives on the New York police force.

After five years Tom Bell becomes the trusted cashier of his bank, and finally succumbs to temptation. His investments with the bank's capital have been utter failures and an examination of the books will show his guilt. Filling his grip with all the money he can lay his hands on, he prepares to leave the city. While in hiding, he sends for his wife and baby, and tells them he will soon send for them to join him in some foreign country.

But fate interferes in these well-laid plans. While returning to his home Mrs. Bell and the baby become separated and the baby is found weeping by Jim O'Neill, now an honored member of the New York detective force. The baby innocently leads the detective to her father's hiding place and Jim recognizes in the absconding cashier his successful rival. After securing the grip containing the money he returns to Tom the revolver he had taken from him. Tom recognizes the significance of the loaded revolver being left to him and pays for the defalcation with his life.

Jim brings the baby to her mother and returns the money to the bank, after receiving the assurance of the bank officials to hush the matter up for the sake of the wife and baby.

Two years later Jim receives his reward by leading to the altar his childhood sweetheart.

OUTWITTING FATHER

Yankee Film Co. Release July 21st

To have your father fall in love with your sweetheart and open all your love letters is indeed an unfortunate position to find yourself in, but "love laughs at locksmiths" as well as plans.

When Willie's sweetheart learns that his father had opened her note to Willie making a secret appointment for that evening, and intended to keep the appointment himself, she prepares a little surprise for him.

With the help of a friendly carpenter and his ladder she releases her sweetheart, who had been locked in his room by his father and then arranges with a colored girl to dress in her clothes and meet the old gentleman. Unawares of this clever ruse, the old gentleman, having shaved his beard and mustache and adorned himself in automobile apparel, goes forth to keep the appointment. To his surprise he is met pleasantly by his son's sweetheart, and she permits him to fondle and kiss her. At this moment the sweetheart arrives and the young lady raises her veil and discloses the grinning features of a colored girl.

A SOLDIER'S LIFE

Great Northern Release July 15th

Amusingly depicts the scrapes a man of mature years and large proportions gets into when he enters the army. His awkward manner of drilling soon gets him into trouble with the officers, while his comrades take advantage of his verdant innocence to play all kinds of tricks upon him.

AT SEA UNDER NAVAL COLORS

An effective picture of life on a battleship. The tars are seen cleaning the great guns, lowering the boats, etc., and then are put through various exercises and drills with bayonets, cutlasses and the like. At off times the happy sailors dance and somersault. Finally we see gunfire practice by several battleships, which conveys a vivid impression of scenes that would occur in a naval war.

THE GIRL AND THE BRONCHO BUSTER

Solax Release July 14th

Ned loves pretty little Jeanette, the winsome young daughter of Bill Murray, a wealthy ranch owner for whom Ned works. The young lover, however, is given to understand in no uncertain terms that his attentions to the girl must cease. Father has greater ambitions for his daughter than having her the wife of an impecunious cow puncher.

Just as matters are in this shape Murray chances to be called away upon a trip and on the route falls in with a convival stranger with whom he becomes acquainted. This acquaintance results in a horse trade whereby Murray becomes the proud owner of a very handsome seal brown mare which he proudly takes home with him. Arrived home, his new horse is examined by the cow punchers and ranchmen, who inform Murray he has been badly tricked, as the horse that he has purchased has a bad temper and vicious habits and that not one of the men can ride her. His chagrin at having gotten the worst of the deal is intensified by the bitter reproaches of his wife, who upbraids him for what he has done.

Finally Murray becomes so wrathy over the whole matter that he offers the hand of his daughter to any man who may prove acceptable to the girl, and who will ride the bucking broncho. Ned is on hand, hears the offer, accepts it and undertakes to carry out its conditions by riding the horse.

Then ensues a speciman of broncho busting that perhaps has never been seen in motion pictures. The mare does her very best to throw her rider, but Ned finally conquers the horse and wins the hand of the daughter.

THAT JUNE BUG

Solax Release July 12th

The story opens with a garden party in full swing. Men and women lightly clad in ducks and muslins are lolling about or dancing to the strains of a violin. Clifford Young and his fiancee have just finished a dance and as they recline upon the lawn beneath the shade of a large elm, we see Clifford ever and anon reach for his lower extremities and subject them to a vigorous scratching. In fact, this operation is repeated so frequently that it attracts the attention of his girl, and finally his action becomes so bothersome that he goes to the dressing room, where, behind a curtain he removes his trousers in order to extract a June bug that is subsequently proven to be the cause of all the trouble. As he vigorously shakes them out of the window he loses his grasp and they fall to the ground, where they are immediately picked up by Weary Willie, who is passing at that moment.

Horrified at the predicament in which he finds himself and not knowing how he is going to make his appearance upon the lawn without his trousers, he induces his friend to lend him his trousers that he may go in search of Weary. Again correctly garbed, Clifford goes out to the party, where the dancing and genial company tend to make him forget all about the tramp with his trousers and his friend back in the dressing room, trouserless, and whom, as time passes, and no Clifford puts in appearance, becomes desperate. Finally he can stand it no longer and with a drapery wrapped about him he makes a cyclonic rush for the scene of the party, where in heated terms he demands of Clifford the return of his trousers.

The scene is then changed and we see Weary Willie wearing the lost trousers, asleep beneath a tree. He awakens and begins to scratch, and after he has been bothered for a few moments we see him reach up the leg of the pants and extract a full-grown June bug, after which he turns over and continues his dream of the hoboes' Valahalla.

"BABY'S RATTLE"

Mrs. Biffem decides that she wants to go out for a walk and instructs hubby to stay home and mind the baby. He objects to this arrangement strenuously, but after a squabble he has to comply with the dictates of his spouse. We next see him alone with the baby, who is making good use of his lungs. Mr. Biffem, almost wild with the noise, throws the baby on the bed and gives it its rattle, while he tries to quiet his jumping nerves with his pipe.

It is in this position that Mrs. Biffem finds her family when she returns and as she goes to the baby she is horrified at not seeing the rattle in its accustomed place. After a wild search they arrive at a mutual decision—the baby has swallowed the rattle. Biffem is hustled off to the doctor and he immediately returns with this worthy, who after a careful examination decides that an operation is necessary.

The baby is examined with the X-ray, and the doctor shows the now thoroughly frightened parents the position of the rattle in the baby's body. Making a more thorough examination he turns the baby over and is astonished to find that the rattle is now on the other side. The baby is held up and subjected to another X-ray examination, and this time nothing of the rattle is seen. Thoroughly mystified, the doctor stands in deep thought. Like a flash he removes the baby from the pillow upon which it has been resting and reaching under the pillow he brings forth the missing rattle. The X-ray has been penetrating both the baby and the pillow. Taking the baby the doctor returns it unharmed to the greatly relieved parents.

"THAT'S HAPPINESS"

Thanhouser Release July 18

Susie Smith was thoroughly happy, although she was poor and an orphan. She had health, a steady job in a factory, and a sweetheart, and really did not worry because of her lack of money. But everything took a change for the worse when she "became a heroine."

There was a fire panic in the factory where she worked, and Susie was the only person who could cope with the emergency. The other girls, thinking of previons disasters, became panic stricken and tried to jump out of the window. But Susie drove them back, scared them into obeying her, formed them into line finally and marched them out of the building in some kind of order. There really was no fire, as it turned out, but had it not been for the work of one quickwitted girl, there would undoubtedly have been a heavy loss of life.

The papers lauded Susie to the skies, especially when they found that she had broken her arm in an effort to restrain the frightened workers. And a rich woman read about it, decided that "poor little Susie" should have a chance, and took her to her rich home.

There the girl had everything that money could buy, but strange to say, she was unhappy. She missed her old friends, the dances where she could "spiel," and that shabby sweetheart of hers. And she stole away one night, reappeared at the factory, got her old job back, and was again thoroughly, genuinely happy. For she was among the people she understood and who understood her, and did not have to worry about what the butler thought, or what was good or bad form.

"TWO LITTLE GIRLS"

Thanhouser Release July 21

A young wife, weary of the monotony of her existence, listens to the flattering speeches of a worthless man, and in a moment of weakness elopes, taking her infant with her. But she is speedily disillusioned, for the man for whom she sacrificed her life turns out to be vicious, idle and ungrateful, and finally leaves her to fight the battle of existence with the world alone. She manages to keep a roof over the head of herself and child for a while, but when a fire wipes out their home, she gives up in despair. Mother and child tramp away, intending to seek the aid of relatives in a city, but on the road the mother dies. Her last act is to give the child her locket, a gift from the husband in happier days, hoping that it may prove a talisman of fortune for her.

In the meantime the husband has secured a divorce and in the course of time, weds again, his second wife being a widow with one child, a little girl. He has prospered financially, and it comes as a shock to him when he hears that his former wife and their child have perished in a fire that destroyed their home.

The poor little girl, in the course of her wanderings, reaches a city and sees a number of happy, well dressed little children, dancing about a May Pole. She would have slunk away, but another child, who arrives in an auto, invites her to come in, and forces her to enter the playground. Later, affected by her story, the little girl takes the shabby stranger home with her, confident that the parents who love her will make life happy for the child who has no one to care for her.

Her expectations are realized, for the shabby child turns out to be the daughter of the rich man, and she is welcomed and made to feel that in her new home she has not only fond parents, but a loving sister.

"JUST FOR HER"

"Imp" Release July 20

Gerald Tompkins and Wilbur Jackson have been friends from youth. They graduate from the same college and are given employment in the same bank. By a strange coincidence they both love Grace Baldwin and become good natured rivals. Jackson is the favored one and Tompkins is surprised one day when Jackson announces his engagement to Grace in her presence. Gerald pulls himself together and congratulates them, saddened by the blow.

Time elapses and Gerald accompanies Wilbur home and the happy husband shows him his baby. Gerald takes the child and congratulates the pair.

Jackson lives a fast life—quite beyond his means—and embezzles money from the bank, juggling the figures so as to keep his peculations a secret for a time. At last the officials of the bank become suspicious and meet to examine the books. In the adjoining room Gerald and Wilbur are working. Wilbur is unduly excited and paces the floor. Finally he confesses to his old friend that he has been robbing the bank in a systematic manner for some time and is in despair, saying the exposure will kill his wife. Gerald sympathizes with him and they are both called in to face the bank officials. They are confronted with the charge of stealing money and making false entries in the books. Gerald takes the crime on himself to shield the husband of the woman he has always loved. He is sentenced to a term in the penitentiary and goes to his incarceration, satisfied that he has spared Grace humiliation.

Wilbur, unable to longer bear the burden, shoots himself and dies after writing a confession which finds its way to his wife. Grace is horrified at the disclosure, but immediately sets about to proclaim the innocence of Gerald by informing his parents of the confession. The aged couple visit the Governor and in turn go to the penitentiary, where their son is restored to them, the stigma removed and he accompanies them home, where he is reinstated in his old position in the bank, where he is welcomed with open arms.

Subsequently Grace visits the bank and is seen by Gerald through the cage. He puts on his hat and follows her, and the story closes with Gerald and Grace married, she happy in the knowledge that her husband has made a great sacrifice for her in attempting to shield her worthless husband.

"THE CLASS REUNION"

"Imp" Release July 17

Professor Burns, an aged instructor, is reduced to poverty and the story opens at his home, where he is receiving the condolence of his good wife. His book, on which he has been working for months, has been declined by publishers and he is in the throes of despair. He has no money to satisfy the butcher but, rather than part with one of his books, he endures the pangs of hunger.

Unexpectedly he receives a note from one of his old pupils inviting him to a banquet in honor of the seven surviving members of the class. He is not inclined to accept the invitation, as he has not the proper clothing, but his wife insists, and from an old trunk resurrects an old-time dress suit and silk hat and he goes away in high glee.

He meets his old pupils and, after a college yell, they repair to the banquet room. The professor, thinking of his starving wife, deftly secretes articles of food in the folds of his napkin and handkerchief, which he afterwards removes to his pockets unseen by any of the guests. During the evening the host exhibits a beautiful, unset ruby he has brought from Persia. The bauble is passed around the table for inspection and is universally admired. It reaches the professor last and, in passing it back to the host, it falls, unnoticed into a wine glass. The host soon discovers the loss of the stone and institutes a search to no avail. One of the diners suggests that a search of the guests be made and that all turn their pockets inside out. All do so except the professor. He is embarrassed and, much to the surprise of all, leaves the room and the house.

One of the men follow him out of curiosity. The professor goes directly home and, without telling his wife what has happened, seats her at a table, takes the food from his pocket and she eats with a relish. The man who has followed witnesses the scene in amazement. He hastens back to the banquet room and tells his fellow classmates of the poverty of their old preceptor.

During his absence the jewel has been found and his story is listened to with attention. The men at the banquet are all interested. They weight themselves down with baskets of food and pay the professor a visit. They present him with many tokens of their love and respect and, when the old professor breaks down in gratitude, they cover his embarrassment with a series of college yells given with a will and the old instructor and his wife are happy.

IMP GOSSIP

L. H. White, formerly with the Gaumont and other foreign firms, has been secured by the Imp company as assistant director. Mr. White has had much moving picture experience and will bring new ideas to the studio.

Irving J. Rubenstein, "Ruby," the hustling property wrangler for Director Clifford, is alternating between the hospital and the studio. Several weeks ago he involuntarily emulated a Wild West rider over in Coytesville and the broncho took him through a plate glass window, interrupting operations in a barber shop. "Ruby" was sliced to ribbons, but came up smiling in due course of time. Last week, while riding in a car out toward New City, the chauffeur missed a rope that was strung taut across the road and "Ruby" was filled with portions of the glass wind-shield. After a few days sojourn in the hospital the property man returned to the task of selecting props and calling down customers over the telephone. Joe O'Donnell, the electrician, has just recovered from a fractured arm, the result of a fall from a step ladder while making some light adjustments.

Mary Pickford, the leading woman of the Imp Company, is now driving her own car, a big touring machine. She is an adept at the wheel, as her friends will attest to, and hits it up dangerously near the speed limit when showing the paces of the car.

W. H. Clifford, the new director, is justly proud of his first effort "In the Sultan's Garden," the release of last Monday night. Mr. Clifford has been something of a globe trotter and is partial to the sea. He has in contemplation several marine stories. Tom Ince—although he never toted a musket— is in his element in a military story. He will soon produce another war story, being a bit proud of his two efforts, "The Forged Despatch," and "The Fortunes of War."

The celebrated vaudeville act, "The Hand," which has been produced in this country and on the continent by Madam Camile Dalberg and her company of pantomimists, was recently filmed at the Imp Company studio, with Madam Dalberg in the leading role. The act is one of the highest priced on the vaudeville stage and will be made a regular Imp release.

"Doc" Willat, accompanied by five camera men, filmed the most thrilling of the stunts at the Niagara Falls celebration, being on the job every minute of the time. Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather they obtained some great pictures.

Nearly all the Imp stars are now commuters, as they have hied themselves to summer resort cottages and hotels to enjoy the few hours of leisure in keeping cool and comfortable. Reporting for posing entails loss of some sleep, in the way of early rising, but they appear to enjoy the life.

BOBBY BOBS UP AGAIN

(Electric, St. Louis)

Please tell me, Mister 'Lectric Man,
What does a dynamo?
And if I plant electric bulbs
Will they take root and grow?

Where does the current run to, please?
Are switches made of hair?
And would it rest me if I sat
In an electric chair?

Suppose a blow-out comes along,
Where would it blow to, pray?
And don't they always have dry cells
Where all the convicts stay?

Why does the wire give you shocks?
Won't it give you other things?
And can you show me in a 'phone
The place it keeps its rings?

I asked my papa most of these;
He laughed, and said you knew,
And that you'd like to hear from me;
That's why I'm asking you.

Among his sales and new motion picture equipments for the past week, Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports the following: Theodore Sachs, Catskill, N. Y., Powers No. 5; Wonderland Amusement Co., Lindsborg, Kans., Edison Model B; Trent Bros. Co., Lynchburg, Va., 1911 Model motiograph, spot light, Globe ticket chopper and supplies.

Frank Beal, director for the Powers Company, is enthusiastic over what he calls a "find" in picture performers. Clara Williams, the new leading woman for the Powers Company, is the reason.

Equipped with years of practical dramatic schooling with the Belasco stock, San Francisco, and important roles in many prominent road organizations, Miss Williams was induced to enter the picture field by the Essanay Co. Her many triumphs while working for that firm attracted the attention of the Powers Company, and her present engagement is the result.

With large, expressive eyes, clear-cut features and an exceptionally good figure, she is indeed an ideal type for the picture actress. Her acting is marked by discretion and intelligence and intense emotional qualities when they are called upon.

When interviewed at the Powers studio yesterday Miss Williams showed great enthusiasm over her new engagement. "I like to work in pictures," she said, "more so than in straight dramatic lines. One has a much wider scope and I think it a wonderful vocation. You have so many chances to work out in God's sunshine that it is a relief from the badly ventilated theaters we have to contend with on the road."

Mr. P. A. Powers, of the Powers Company, has just returned from the Thousand Islands, where he completed preliminary arrangements for the production of several important film subjects there.

A company under the direction of Frank Beal will leave next week to carry out the Powers preliminary arrangements.

While there Mr. Powers rented a small hotel for the exclusive use of the company, a 50-foot yacht and a Packard touring car for the summer.

Much interest is being shown in the coming Powers release, Nat Wills in the King of Kazam. This will be the first of a series of Powers productions with well-known theatrical stars as a feature. They also have under way a production featuring Fred Walton, the famous "Toy Soldier" of vaudeville fame.

New York, July 1st.

Editor Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir:—The other day I picked up an old copy of a moving picture magazine and my eye caught an item which to me seemed like either personal prejudice or lack of knowledge of one's subject. The writer, whose name was not signed, in criticizing a certain picture stated that the man who played the lead was evidently not an actor, for he knew absolutely nothing of stage etiquette for his gestures and crosses were very bad.

Well, for your benefit, Mr. Critic, should this meet your eye, allow me to elucidate from practical experience. I myself posed in that same picture so can, therefore, give you some information to put under your Kelly.

The man who played the lead is a thorough actor and understands stage etiquette from A to Z, having been in the employ of Frohman and Belasco for a number of years.

Where the fault lies is with the stage director, who, like many other in the picture business, does not know the meaning of the word stage etiquette, for he tried to inject his personality into the actor, and, when the actor tried to tell him the correct way, he was told to do what he was asked and shut up, so in order to hold his position he had to follow his instructions. For instance, he was told that whenever he was to make an exit, he was to point and say "I'm going out," then to make his exit, which is quite unnecessary. Now this same director two years ago was a clerk in a country store. Do you think he was a fit man to fill the position? Answering my own question, no he was not, for, like many other directors whom I can name, he kept continually insulting the intelligence of the audience by broadening all gestures.

Now in conclusion let me advise you that hereafter before you criticize a picture, go out and get some practical experience, watch some director put on a picture, and do not knock the man who does not deserve it. I consider you a nuisance, for you are just like a highway robber, you knock a man on the head, whether he deserves it or not, to gain a living.

But I trust that this article will catch your eye and cause a reform.

Another Thanhouser Detective Story

THE SMUGGLERS

is a film mystery story of the first class, one that places your bill for the day you run it amongst bills of the first class. So let this be your feature picture that day, especially if it's a very warm day, for the picture is a logical warm weather release with enough breezy seascapes in it to keep it cool. The portrayal of the parts of the pretty smuggler and the detective who trapped her is most realistic; and, indeed, each player in the picture puts over his part in a way that pleases.

A DOLL'S HOUSE

BY HENRIK IBSEN

is the answer of the Thanhouser Company to the call of the exhibitors of America for another Ibsen picture, sounded immediately after the release of our first Ibsen reel, "Pillars of Society," a short time ago. The picture carries all the great dramatic qualities that made Ibsen's writings so powerful in play form, and you cannot go wrong if you rig up some special advertising display for this very fine feature. Simply the words "A Doll's House, by Ibsen" will do, outside the show, but paint 'em in big letters with the name "Thanhouser" underneath as a guarantee of merit. No. 230 Code Word, Douse

OUR FRONT COVER ILLUSTRATION

The picture in the circle this week is a scene taken from "Jerusalem Delivered," The World's Best Film Company's production to be released shortly. We have reviewed this film in our issue of the 1st, to which we refer our readers, and will say further that this subject is one of the most magnificent it has been our privilege to witness on the screen.

PECULIAR TACTICS

Answers to Correspondents

During the past week or two many letters have been addressed to us asking our opinion on the question of projecting machines, film, and the "Independent exhibitors use." In sime of these letters there seems to be a dread that the M. P. P. Co. is going to use drastic measures to compel the exhibitors to pay $104.00 per year, give up the use of Independent film and use the General Film Co.'s supplies. Two of the writers state they have written to a contemporary asking advice, and they are advised (privately and confidentially, of course) to accede to the requests made to them for their own salvation. Our readers need not lose one hour's sleep because of these veiled threats, nor should they heed the advice given by false friends. The M. P. P. Co. have been thoroughly routed in the U. S. Circuit Courts, have proved their claims for patents invalid, and as we pointed out to our readers four years ago, the so-called patents were not worth the paper they were written on. So we to-day tell our readers that the patents (so-called) on the projecting machines—the loop—the film—the perforations—and all the other intimidating claims will be declared invalid. We have film in our possession made in 1889, perforated in 1889, and used with a loop long, long prior to the time the patent was taken out. We are informed that sneaks—in the guise of intending purchasers—are visiting repair shops, going among the exhibitors, asking to examine their machine, and other various specious devices to obtain information, which we caution our readers to withhold from them. We have snap shot photographs of some of these men, and are waiting advice before reproducing them in our columns.

Some of the letters have been received from Connecticut, Massachusetts, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and New York. In some of these states active organizations of exhibitors are in full working order for the protection of their members. The company, M. P. P. Co., General Film Co., or whatever name it goes under, is a New Jersey corporation. We understand it (or they) is not registered in any other state. It is not complying with the laws of other states. As we pointed out in a previous editorial, the G. F. Co. is not paying the state tax due to the comptroller of your state. Exhibitors' organizations, if any of your members are threatened individually or collectively, now is your opportunity, call the attention of your state secretaries or governors to this anomaly, and see that they do their duty. Furthermore, bear in mind that as the G. F. Co. is not a domestic corporation, it has no power to bring action in your state, it is out of jurisdiction, and as such we advise you to get your attorneys to attack them on these points. Every exhibitor who is paying $2.00 per week or $104.00 per year—paid in advance—for protection, which does not protect, is a very foolish man. We have told you this so many times we are almost tired of reiterating the statement. Look at the Independent exhibitors, they are getting as good a service as you are. Their audiences are as well pleased. Their houses are as well filled, and they are saving money. Saving $104.00 per year. The Moving Picture News has always stood for the principle of full, free American independence. For the principle of a man getting what he pays for. The Moving Picture News is the only independent paper in the industry to-day. It is the only paper not owned and controlled by film manufacturers.

The flag for full freedom still waves at the mast head, and as in the past, so in the future, we will answer our readers' questions and steer them away from the rocks and shoals that are so abundant in motionpicturedom. We do not need to write almost libelous letters to prospective advertisers, or to exchangemen, or to exhibitors, and when other editors do such, our readers may rest assured the letters are dictated by the masters of the writers, who would sink principle or prestige for a dollar. When our readers ask us why such and such are not represented in our columns, and appear elsewhere, we may reply, all have a perfect right to their own opinion and choice; but sometimes we use our own option, and refuse point blank to accept, and while we have been threatened with legal proceedings for refusing them, no action has yet been taken. We act perfectly within our rights, and furthermore, rather than print some things we know to be absolutely false and fraudulent, rather than have them appear in our columns we would not print the Moving Picture News. We protect our readers first, ourselves next, and all who deal with our advertisers can be fully assured they are getting a square deal. For this reason, and this alone, we request the full support of Nickelodia.

The following extracts from correspondence should be read carefully and well digested.

"It might be well for your paper to call the attention of the Pennsylvania state authorities to the fact that the General Film Company is doing business in the State of Pennsylvania or had been up to a short time ago without paying tax. If you will recall this fact was mentioned to you last January. It is to be regretted that the State Department did not prosecute them for their unlawful act, but understand the common usage is to notify a delinquent to have their company registered and pay the proper tax, but no mention is made of the arrearage."

The above quotation will to a large extent speak for itself. Another extract says, "I want to say that the Independents do not know how much they are indebted to you for the fight you made in their behalf. I appreciate the fact that you have been consistent in your fight, and your journal ought to be patronized and supported by every Independent manufacurer, exchange, and exhibitor within the United States. Wishing you unbounded prosperity."

Another letter from Illinois says, "I wonder what the Independents are thinking about that they do not give you their whole undivided support. It makes my heart ache to see how they seem to ignore you, but perhaps you have a reason, and you know more than I do about the question, still I think for the great fight and the innumerable sacrifices you have made for the Independents, they ought to give you their unqualified and undivided support to the exclusion of every other medium. Will you tell me what the decision of the Illinois courts is regarding the film question?"

To our Chicago correspondent we may reply that Judge Kohlsaat in the celebrated case of Edison vs. George Kleine forbade any other action to be brought in the courts of Chicago until the patent had been fully adjudicated. This has not yet been done, consequently Judge Kohlsaat's decision still holds. We have many other letters it is impossible to take up in the short space at our disposal, and we are compelled to hold them over for a future issue.

THE DETROIT CONVENTION

The State Convention of Michigan have had quite a gala time at Detroit during this week. The following information comes to hand that S. J. Jessup is the president, W. Lester Levey the master of ceremonies of the convention, which opened at 10:30 a.m. and settled down to business. At 4:30 the exhibitors were taken for an auto ride and dinner. Isidor Bernstein, Mark Dintenfass and David Horsley were present from New York, and T. Kennedy, from Chicago, representing the Sales Co.

The convention witnessed some very good independent films which were well applauded, and the Sales Company gave a lunch to the convention on the 12th, of which we have not yet full particulars but will try and give full report in our next issue.

AN ENTERPRISING EXHIBITOR

There is one wide-awake. up-to-date exhibitor, and that exhibitor is a lady. Her name is Dolly Spurr, and a very appropriate name too, we imagine, as she is spurring on with an enterprise, we have not seen a man exhibitor yet have the courage to tackle. This lady has a theater, "The Royal," of Marion, Indiana, and she has gotten up a sixteen page and cover booklet entitled "The Royal Reports," which is indeed a compliment to her ladyship, and she tells in that paper everything that is worth knowing concerning the independent films. The thanks of the whole Independent section are due to her for her enterprise, which we hope will be successful.

ing the two processions, the Garter investiture, the London camps, the Victoria Memorial, and the Naval Review—all presented with an accompaniment of novel and faithful "sound effects" which invest the pictures with a keen semblances of reality—has taken so vigorous a hold upon the London public that the Scala Theater is filled to overflowing at every performance, and he urgently requests intending visitors to book their seats beforehand to avoid disappointment. Moreover, the present program is proving itself, in theatrical parlance, a "repeat show," hundreds of visitors taking the opportunity before leaving of reserving seats for future dates. The next addition to the Coronation entertainment will be a brilliant pictorial record of the Investiture of the Prince of Wales at Carnarvon Castle next week, and Mr. Urban has, as usual, been granted the fullest privileges by the Comptroller of his Majesty's household.

PROGRESSION NEVER SLEEPS

By Margaret I. MacDonald

I trust the editor will pardon me if my article this week takes somewhat the nature of a eulogy to himself. In reading again and again, quotations from letters of people, who, having taken up the standard for the higher and better things in the moving picture business, have as quickly laid it down, I marvel at the steady and unswerving manner in which our editor persists in carrying out his purpose of forging ahead in the cause of the educational film, against all such discouragements.

There is an ever widening field for the educational film, in spite of the remarks to the contrary. There are thousands of schools and colleges in this country alone which will ere long realize the absolute necessity of adopting the moving picture educational method. Many of them have already been looking seriously into the subject. The demand for the educational film is in excess of the supply even to-day. When this fact is realized the producers will need no coaxing in order to persuade them to meet the demand.

I admire Mr. Saunders' energy in keeping at the thing. To him, and a very few others, is due the credit for keeping the question alive. The Moving Picture News is representative of independence in thought, and word, and deed, and is found ever on the side of right and justice. And to its editor with his indomitable energy, his high sense of honor, and his intelligent personality are due the tactics of the magazine and the elevated plane upon which it is run.

Progression cannot sleep. Its flow never ceases. You may turn its channel, if you will, but you cannot check its flow. Since the material world has had its being evolution has never ceased. So the moving picture business, though it may be in the hands of many men incompetent to wrestle with it in connection with higher problems of life, men who may be unable to properly apply its usefulness, still with a few men of our editor's type at the helm, it cannot fail in time—and in a very short time at that—to come into its own, and to find its proper niche in this world's usefulness.

Kinemacolor will be a large factor in opening the eyes of the world to the limitless facilities of the moving picture to be of use. And while kinemacolor is holding our attention and admiration, some other invention of which we do not even dream will be on its way to completion. And so it is in the train of progressive; while our time is taken up with conjecturings, and sometimes with idle scorning, some master mind, with a purpose infallible, is working out one of the wonders of the age. So it will be to the end of time; only a few will persevere, only a few will be strong in their own convictions; the balance will be as sheep that follow.

A suggestion has been made to me which sounds very good, and which seems to me to be quite feasible. In our city we have what is called a Hall of Fame in which are placed busts, statues, paintings, etc., of the men and women of our nation who have in some commendable way made themselves famous. Why could there not be a Hall of Records established in which there could be recorded in moving pictures of the most modern type events most important in the history of our country with their dates thereon. This would be a wonderful boon to posterity, and a great help by way of comparison and example. The suggestion is worthy of serious thought, and I sincerely hope that the educators of this country will consider it.

MOVING PICTURES AND PUBLIC LIBRARIES

By A. L. Barrett

Pictures have occupied an important place in the affections of the human race from the earliest days, and there has always been a demand for pictorial representations of familiar scenes which were, at first, more or less crude, but which at once evidenced and satisfied this natural human instinct. They were the first indications of refinement, and the Egyptians, perhaps the greatest of all picture lovers, very early learned to depict in vivid strokes and with lavish hand, the daily life of the inhabitants. In those first days of civilization, even in Egypt, the home of all the known culture of the world and where the refinements of domestic life were known as in no other country, the art of reading was a rare accomplishment, but all except the blind could understand the language which silently, yet so eloquently, depicted the national life. These picture representations, as may easily be seen by reference to Egyptian antiquities, were by no means equal to what we have to-day, but such as they were, represented this natural human craving for pictures, and it is not too much to say that the Egyptians would have been among the first to appreciate the moving pictures of to-day.

There is, and always has been, a magnetism about pictures which attracts every one, in a greater or less degree, and with children they are special favorites. Educators have long ago recognized this, and the first books given to a child are attractively illustrated, for, although the average youngster does not love study, yet it is the exceptional one who will cast aside a picture book, even though a lesson has to be learned in connection with it. Pictures being instantaneously photographed on the brain, are rarely, if ever, entirely forgotten. Most of us can remember the illustrations with which our books of early life were ornamented, or if temporarily forgotten, are instantly recalled by a glance at the pictures in question. This magnetism possessed by the silent, motionless picture with which we have always been familiar, would seem to account for the popularity of the moving pictures, for in them we see before us, not one, but a series of pictures, apparently imbued with life, suddenly becoming a vivid—a living reality, intense with life, more vividly impressed on us because no words accompany them—every movement filled with a meaning as plain as words could tell, and, therefore, these moving pictures possess the same attraction, magnetism, call it what you will, but in a thousandfold degree stronger, than the ordinary picture.

Moving pictures have a strong attraction for most adults, but these lifelike portrayals impress children still more vividly Their curiosity and interest are at once aroused and stimulated, and the series of pictured events are rapidly photographed on their brains in such a lifelike manner as fascinates their eyes and engrosses their whole attention. Children are quick discerners, and in the clearly depicted stories they can readily see the difference between right and wrong, and cause and effect are shown so plainly that the youngest children likely to be taken to such picture plays will usually understand most of the story, but if all is not quite clear to them, these pictured narratives will arouse their interest to such an extent, that, on their return home, they will, either by reading or questioning, find out the truth of the matter. The motion pictures can, therefore, be considered as a brain-stimulant, and if used in education would develop the brain in a natural manner and much sooner than by the method so long in use, i.e., text books with, possibly, some illustrations.

Now, as motion pictures possess this attraction in so great a degree, to what better use could they be put than to encourage at the earliest age possible that familiarity with the best literature which is so desirable and necessary to the educated person? This is being recognized more and more by educators, and there is no doubt that the moving pictures will be one of the most potent factors in the education of the younger generation and one of the best and most popular methods of disseminating information on all subjects among the working, and especially the emigrant population. A great many books are being dramatized for the picture play curtain all over the country and are in every case, received with warm signs of approval by old and young. Motion pictures are being used now in connection with church and educational work, in lecture rooms, etc., and in Madison, Wisconsin, the Library Department experimented several months ago with a few films—Launcelot and Elaine, Oliver Twist and a few others—for the children of that city, a moving picture room being fitted up and tickets of admission being distributed to children of the seventh and eighth grades. The matter was in charge of the Children's Librarian, Miss Wilde, who told the stories in a simple way, suited to the years of her audience, and then the pictures were shown. It has proved a great success, and the moving picture department is now a regular part of the library work.

It cannot be said that either Launcelot and Elaine or Oliver Twist can be considered as children's literature, but it would certainly be interesting to know the percentage of children which refused to see the books as against those which had refused to read them. There are gems of literature, the above included, which, although not exactly children's books, yet would be read by them if presented in an attractive form. In the old days, nobody dreamed of writing children's classics, and they had to wade through books fitted for mature minds only, and were expected to understand what they learned, but with the advent of books specially fitted for their needs, children have become greater readers than ever before. However, it is not so easy to present adult fiction in such a form, at least, not very much of it, and the quickest way to get a child to read is to show him the picture first, and he will generally make the attempt to read the book. Take him to the moving picture play, however, which shows the whole book, and you will have no difficulty in inducing him to read it from beginning to end. This, of course, does not apply to every book that ever was written, but to such writers as Dickens, Tennyson, Longfellow, Scott, Cooper and others.

If, by using the motion pictures, the public library can only inculcate a love of literature in the younger generation, a great deal has been accomplished, for a reading nation means a thinking nation, but the conviction that there is practically no limit to the sphere of the moving pictures is gaining ground every day, and the increasing number of pictured stories from history, Biblical and otherwise, must eventually have a broadening and elevating effect on the minds of the thousands of all classes who visit these picture plays every day in the year. It is very evident now to most people that the moving picture play is yet in its infancy, and the industry is undoubtedly destined to a field of usefulness as is yet undreamed of, but that it will be one of the most potent factors in the future education is now admitted by all.

"PIED PIPER," RATS AND ALL, IN FILM

"The Pied Piper of Hamelin," who has come down through the ages in song and story because of his wonderful achievement in driving the rats into the sea with his magical pipes, has been done into a film by Thanhouser, and we are due to see his deeds on the screen by Tuesday, August 1st, his official release date.

There are two versions of the Piper's achievements that have been handed down to us. They differ from each other in their finish only. Of course, you remember that the town council of Hamelin promised the Piper a thousand guilders if he could rid the town of the rats, and that when his piping persuasion brought the rats forever from out of Hamelin, the councillors gave him a laugh and a miserable fifteen guilders.

You remember, too, that the Pied Piper spat upon the few coins flung him, and that night played a magical strain on his marvelous pipe—whereupon all the children or the town, including the offspring of the crooked councillors, fell in after the Piper and followed him out of Hamelin.

But here is where the versions differ. One has it that the Piper in his scheme for revenge disappeared forever with the tots and left the homes of Hamelin forever desolate. The other version tells of a cripple boy in the crowd of youngsters whose plight so touched the sympathies of the Piper that he hearkened to the lad's pleas and restored the children to grief-stricken Hamelin, who took the lesson much to heart. This is the pleasanter version. The New Rochelle producers believe in light and sunshine in stories, and the particular reel is wisely surcharged with these elements.

HIS DIVE TO DEATH ON FILMS

Motion Picture Actor Sticks in Muddy Bottom of Pond

A moving picture being taken recently of a man making a fancy dive from a boat turned out to be a picture of a man diving to his death. The tragedy occurred in Brady's Pond, Grassmere, Staten Island. Albert Breyten, an actor, 35 years old, who lived in 139 West Thirty-ninth street, Manhattan, was the victim.

Breyten was an expert swimmer and diver and he took part in scenes where his skill in the water came in play. Breyten went out in a flat-bottom boat to do fancy diving for the films.

When everything was ready Breyten dived from one end of the boat and the operator of the picture machine kept turning the crank in anticipation of the man rising. Breyten did not come up again, however, and the supposition is he stuck head first in the muddy bottom of the pond. Grappling irons were obtained and the body was found.

AN IMPORTANT LETTER FROM THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP OF MOTION PICTURES

July 11, 1911.

Editor, Motion Picture News, 30 West Thirteenth street, New York City.

Dear Sir: Recently there has been a number of criticisms in the newspapers upon the film entitled "The Nun." Some of the published statements have been that this picture was not passed by this board. As the picture was passed by this body it is only due to the manufacturer that we make this statement.

In passing this picture the board looked upon it as merely a dramatic production. Such questions as to whether the picture is untrue or unrepresentative of certain phases of life do not come within the scope of our censorship. A very sordid interpretation could have been taken of the actions of the priest or a perfectly unobjectionable view, aside from the fact that he was breaking his vows, could also be taken. There are certain questions of good taste and consideration of the general public which are outside the scope of any general censorship. These questions are entirely up to those who are directly interested in the amusement.

In connection with the various newspaper statements upon this incident we wish to correct an apparent inaccuracy in an interview with one of the members of the board given in a New York paper. It stated that only certain companies were co-operating with this board. Since last fall every manufacturer and importer of motion pictures in the country has been submitting their pictures to this board and have consistently lived up to their agreements that any eliminations asked for by us would be so made. Very truly yours,

THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP,
WALTER STOREY, General Secretary.

"THE CALL OF THE SONG"

"The Call of the Song" is one of the most worthy of the efforts of the Imp company recently and the film has been pronounced an unique and excellent love story. The story shows the love of an unsophisticated country girl for her companion from boyhood, who goes to the city and enters upon a gay life, forgetting his protestations of love in the enjoyment furnished by a blase set with whom he is thrown in contact. In many ways the rural sweetheart reminds him of her constant devotion and the incidents are touching in the extreme. He has promised to return to her with the last rose of summer, but that time finds her demented on account of her grief. The young man is suddenly awakened to his shame by a song and his better nature asserts itself and brings him to a realization of the sham of it all, of the unworthiness of his society friends. He returns to the village, seeks out the girl and finds her in the garden plucking roses, her reason dethroned. He sings the song and her brain clears. The story is written around the song, "With the Last Rose of Summer I'll Return to You," the song hit of the Carl Laemmle Music Company.

By G. F. Blaisdell

One Rev. D. F. Bliss, connected with the Social Center Association of New York, has announced that beginning to-morrow open-air entertainments will be given by his organization in the crowded parts of the city as a counter-attraction to the moving picture shows for children. Mr. Bliss says that illustrated lectures on Paris, Rome, London and other cities, with moving pictures and vocal and instrumental music, will form part of the programme. It is said that Mr. Bliss will be glad to hear from any amateurs who may be willing to give their services to the "cause." Incidentally—and this is important—a charge of five cents will be made to cover the expenses. It ought to be almost as easy to see the finish of this proposition as it is the start. People—especially not on the Bowery, where friend Bliss opens his crusade—will not pay money to witness "amateur nights"—that is, unless they expect to get their money's worth in horseplay. Illustrated lectures are not popular. They have been tried in Keith's, at Fourteenth street and Broadway for years. The writer does not know what the management thinks of them, but it is his observation that ten or fifteen minutes of "Illustrated talk" will create plenty of room for newcomers.

Thomas Bates, of Pembroke, Mass., has capitalized the athletic prowess of his son and namesake by posing him before a moving-picture camera. The child is 23 months old and weighs 26 pounds. A percentage of the profits of the exhibition of the pictures—however they may be determined—is to be set aside for "Baby Hercules."

A dispatch to the New York Times says that a novelty furnishing much amusement in Berlin will shortly be introduced into the United States. Certainly it should be popular with those who have an overfondness for watching their own reflection in a mirror. In Berlin there are a number of shops where a customer, after attitudinizing before a motion camera, receives a roll of photographs packed in a small metal box. By turning a crank the pictures are made to appear in kinematographic succession.

Frank Carroll, a moving-picture photographer employed by a Philadelphia firm, had an experience in Newfoundland while getting some whaling pictures he will not soon forget. Mr. Carroll had gone out in a steam whaler and the steamer had come up quite close to a cow whale accompanied by a calf. A bomb harpoon had been lodged behind the ear of the former. Mr. Carroll's story is worth reading:

"The calf had been playing about the mother, and when the bomb exploded the cow leaped, or breached, so that her whole body was clear of the sea. I was sitting on the rail of the steamer grinding the camera for all I was worth. The whale, maddened by the wound, made for the ship, butting it so hard that I was jarred from the rail into the water. I lost my grip on the camera and struck out for it. Just then I saw the calf coming. A whale calf twenty-five feet long looks as big as a record-breaking bull whale to a man in the water, and I got out of the way as fast as I could, but not being fitted with propellers I was not quite swift enough. Naturally I set my camera adrift again so I could use all my energy in swimming to the line that had been tossed to me from the steamer. The calf whale did not get me, but it hit my camera with a swish of its flukes and smashed it to smithereens."

Mr. Carroll also got some films of caribou hunting in the winter, and views of the spring migration of caribou herds. He said thousands of the animals moved across the country just as the bison used to do on the plains here.

In Buffalo the exhibitors are fighting a proposed Sunday closing law. Steps were taken two years ago to close the picture shows on Sunday, but Justice White issued an injunction restraining the police from interfering with the shows so long as proper pictures were shown. That injunction still stands. The Buffalo ministers now propose to get after the shows through an ordinance.

The ministers may win out. They may think if they do they will get more people in their churches. They may be disappointed.

The attorney-general of Texas has ruled that a moving-picture show traveling from town to town need not pay a license to show in a theater where the manager has taken out a license.

Philadelphia is the last on the list of the complainants against the censorship. The Episcopal Diocesan Social Service committee of the City of Brotherly Love unsparingly condemns picture shows and declares there is a growing public opinion in favor of a censorship! The committee says in its report:

"These show places are mostly crowded with young people and children whose minds are fed and imagination fired with debasing and depressing suggestions.

"Many of these show places are next to a saloon. It has been found that the effect of the pictures on the minds of the onlookers is not so injurious as the conditions under which they are exhibited. The sanitary conditions are anything but wholesome."

Probably much good has been accomplished by agitators for reform in pictures. Very likely work remains to be done. But the successful work of the future will be done by broad-gauged men and women, those who are near the people and who know and comprehend them. Such work will not be accomplished by the narrow-gauged persons whose leisure is too great and whose ideals of the beyootiful, the go-od and the tryue are far removed from the understanding of red-blooded human beings.

The moving picture is a mark for the notoriety-seeking busybodies in every community. Note this: "Many of these show places are next to a saloon." What would the Social Service Committee? Would it remove the picture show and leave the saloon in undisputed possession of the field? It may not have dawned on the committee, but it will learn in time that the saloon-keeper is the loser in the competition.

Let the committee pay much attention to sanitary conditions. It may shine in that work.

During the recent aviation meet at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Lincoln Beachey, airman, took several thousand feet of film at an altitude of a thousand feet. Three flights were required. Beechey strapped the camera to the left of his seat, so that he could turn the handle of the camera while at the same time controlling his machine.

The Evening World recently printed an interesting story of the rush of actors to get into moving pictures rather than take chances on summer stock. It quotes a woman employment agent as saying that more actors are seeking engagement with moving-picture firms than ever before, and that there are probably two thousand actors in studios at the present time. The agent also said that the salary of a leading man runs from $100 to $175 a week and that of a leading woman from $50 to $300. She also said that the lowest salary of a member of a moving-picture stock company is $30 a week. Some of the picture actors may be pardoned if they express curiosity as to who gets that $300 for fifty-two weeks in the year.

Says the Albany Times-Union: "The theaters have lost their gallery audiences largely because they have not been presenting plays that appeal to perennially fresh intelligence and taste, but have been catering to the fads of the hour and to those still more corrupted by the grosser lusts of the flesh. The theaters will fill their galleries with people of the finest if not of the flashiest quality if they will present better plays. * * * The moving pictures will not be put out of business by cheap gallery admissions."

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., July 12.—Once again the picture managers promise to hook up with the "powers that be," but this time it is the city officials and not the county authorities. The promised row will break the moment the official collector attempts to get the $200 the city levies against each manager for the pleasure of showing motion pictures, and this sum, take it from me, the managers are going to resist paying. Ever since they were forced to close on Sunday by the county authorities and the hotel men successfully defeated an ordinance levying an assessment on each room, the picture managers also came to the conclusion that the city had no right to assess them either. The time for the collection of the aforementioned "two hundred" has arrived.

Recently the picture managers got into a large touring car and went sailing to the office of Hon. Alonzo Curl, one of the most distinguished attorneys in Hot Springs, a gentleman who was former chancellor and who, I hear, is again slated for this high office. They outlined their case to Judge

Curl and asked him his opinion. The views he gave seemed to meet the approbation of the picture men and Judge Curl was engaged to look after the combined interests of the managers in this coming fight. It is doubtful if the picture men could have selected any one more learned in the law to represent them, and in Judge Curl the city will find an opponent worthy of their best efforts. The Judge has everything prepared to carrry the case immediately into chancery court. The city has made no effort to collect this fine, or assessment, or whatever one may call it, and it is thought that the city attorney is busy preparing the necessary defense of the municipality's position in the controversy that is sure to come.

If the managers win this suit, which they feel confident of doing, city council will likely take other action that will stand the closest inspection of the higher courts, for no one imagines for a moment that the managers will be allowed to run without payment of some license to the city, which at present is in sad need of funds. The city will more than likely in the near future take some action relative to straightening this matter out, and events are expected to happen within a very few days. The outcome is awaited with interest by all concerned. Up to the present time, however, the local papers, although being in possession of the story, have refrained from touching on the same.

I was much interested in a leading editorial published the past week in the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, one of the leading papers of the South. It was entitled "History of Moving Pictures." The paper seems to be under the impression that there were no coronation pictures taken and regrets very much that the authorities did not have the camera man present to film that historic event. However, there were, as many know, pictures taken of the parade and other features of this great event. For the value and compliment given to motion photography I clipped the editorial in question and now submit it, feeling sure that those of the trade who read the same will feel happy to think that they are part of an industry that is rapidly coming forward as one of the most important factors in the preservation of events that go down in history. The editorial in question says:

"It is a matter of regret that the English Government did not permit moving pictures to be taken of the coronation. It would have been a historic record for future years to come. The scenes of the coronation will probably never be repeated. No future coronation will ever be such a spectacular affair. If moving pictures had been taken they could be preserved for generations. They would be invaluable as matters of record.

"The Confederate historical societies were wise in having the scenes of the Little Rock reunion photographed. These films are perfect. They show the surviving generals and surviving men in gray. Soon they will pass from the active stage of life to join their comrades on the other side, but the films remain for generations. They will be valuable historical records and should be treasured for our sons and grandsons and their sons and grandsons.

"All of the world's great events should in this way be preserved.

"One of the most interesting pictures ever produced was the earthquake at Messina, Italy. It just happened that when the quake occurred an artist was preparing to take a view of the bay. He unconsciously caught a view that no other obtained, and it will be preserved among the archives of Italy.

"The same was true of the San Francisco fire, for many thousand feet of film were used in photographing the progress of the conflagration.

"Had the views of the coronation been transferred to the film of the moving picture machine the entire world would be enabled to see the wonderful sights and scenes enacted in honor of King George. His countrymen in India, who could not be present, could see; his subjects in the British Isles would be enabled to cheer the coronation in the years to come, just as veterans will cheer the pictures of the late reunion.

"Such films, while not so valuable to-day, will be to-morrow and the day after.

"When the next reunion is held in Macon, Ga., there will be a feeble old guard. The parade in Little Rock will, no doubt, be the last, but the world can see what that vanishing army did on that occasion.

"History can be written. The words of men live long after they have gone, but the moving picture does more. It brings correctly before the eyes of many generations the actual historic happenings of the past. This is why it is a matter of regret that the English Government prohibited the pictures."

Again from the southland comes the report of renewed theatrical activity, especially in Memphis, where the arrival of Jake Wells, of the Wells-Bijou-Stanback circuit of Southern theaters, created all sorts of rumors. It is believed that Mr. Wells will rebuild the old Bijou, which was burned down, and a prominent apartment store in Memphis, together with adjoining property, is said to have been purchased with the intention of erecting thereon a modern theater.

Among the pictures seen here the past week one, an American, "A Western Waif," abounded in all kinds of good scenery, but inconsistent situations. Especially was this true in the latter part of the picture, where the young man goes into the bad lands. Naturally he had to go to the very spot where he found the "poor gell" and arrived there famished and dying from thirst. She followed him none the worse for the experience and did the rescue act that he accomplished for her when they first met. The situation was improbable, yet the acting was fine. Fault was with the plot and not, thank goodness, with the company, which is a good one.

There was one reel here the past week that made the ladies get out their cambric and wipe eyes. I refer to the Imp's "Little Leader." To my mind this was a "real leader," and it certainly scored a great success at the Photo Play and Scenic. The acting was immense and the plot was very good. I liked the photography of the picture, too, which easily took precedent for worth over a majority of the Trust product. Thanhouser—and it would do Thanhouser good to hear the local exhibitors yelling for their two a week—had two of its reels play a return date, which was due to request made for the same. One was "The Railroad Builder," with its great fire scene, pronounced by many the most realistic ever seen in pictures in this city, and the other was "Pillars of Society." Thanhouser is a great favorite in Hot Springs. Also want to compliment the firm on the neat issue of the Thanhouser News that comes to me each week containing a cut of the prominent members of the company and a fine synopsis of their latest pictures. Nestor also sent me some very excellent pictures the past week of members of their company, which, Nestor, I turned over to the management of the Photo Play for their lobby display. On their behalf, as well as myself, I thank you sincerely. Had the pleasure of looking at your reel, "At Panther Creek," and, Nestor, it was a dandy. Keep it up.

"The Fighting Rev. Caldwell" scored a big success at the Scenic the past week, for which, Champion, accept the thanks of the management of that place. Wish that some of the local exhibitors would get a few of the Great Northern films here, for some of the best pictures I have ever looked at have come from that firm. Lately, however, we have not had very many, a majority of the reels being Imp, Thanhouser, Rex, Nestor, Reliance and American, together with a good sprinkling of Bison reels. Speaking of the latter firm, "His Lordship's Hunting Trip" was a great laugh-getter and went with a roar of applause and giggles the past week.

Among the Trust honors the blue ribbon of the week goes to Selig, for their "Range Pals" was a treat. This reel was so realistic that a woman back of me in the Lyceum, when the cowpuncher was hurrying back to save his chum from being hanged, yelled: "For God's sake, man, hurry, hurry." Of course, the audience roared with laughter, but it was a compliment to the intense interest the reel aroused. As a human interest story it was in a class by itself. The Lyceum, I understand, has put in a bid for "Captain Kate" as soon as it is released, and this reel is being awaited with a great deal of pleasant anticipation.

The Saturday night drawing at the Photo Play Theater is attracting a great deal of attention, owing to the very pretty and valuable prizes that are given away. For the past three weeks on Saturday the management has awarded prizes to the one holding the lucky number that any man or woman would be proud to possess. Last Saturday a magnificent silver toilet set, consisting of nine pieces, was given away, and, as usual, the theater was packed. This theater is enjoying a great business, too.

The local operators have decided to form a union and affiliate themselves with the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees. Recently there have been several meetings held in Carpenters' Hall, the official union labor headquarters, and everything, it appears, has been arranged for the securing of the charter. In some of the theaters here it has been customary for the operator to "double" on the stage. In any event, the success of many a vaudeville act depends on the manner in which the spot light and effects worked from the operator's booth is handled. They are eligible, it seems, to membership in this organization, and the operators of the city are to be commended for at last getting together and having a voice in an organization as worthy as this one.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington, D. C.

An incident worth recalling occurred the other night at the Auditorium when the "Indian Nemesis" was being shown. It will be remembered that this depicts the rescue of a little child from the Mexicans by an Indian who loves the tot, but while the child is being hurried away he realizes nothing of the dangers and playfully enjoys the horseback ride, waving his hands gleefully in the air. The effect that this story had upon a tot of about the same size as the picture-child was made clear when the lights came up after the reel of the "Indian Nemesis," for there upon the stage stood a youngster waving its hands playfully to the astonished spectators. It appears that the child had stolen from its mother, sitting some distance from the stage, and crept upon the stage expecting to see the picture-baby, but as this baby disappeared the tot turned its attention to the audience and imitated what he had seen the other tot do when riding on horseback. There was great applause at once at this spontaneous act and a bewildered mother, seeing her own baby facing her, walked up the aisle and gently lifted the youngster over the footlights. This was the child's first appearance on the stage, but there was no sign of stage fright.

Manager Noonan, of the Virginia, has worked out a new scheme of bringing cooling thoughts to his patrons by exhibiting a large block of ice in which is frozen the feature reel of the day's show. It is quite unique to serve the "Coronation," "Macbeth" and a number of other attractions and people in ice to patrons.

Two additional houses have entered the ranks of the Moore Amusement Company. These are the Star and the Princess. Mr. Tom Moore has just purchased a big Pope-Hartford touring car and can be seen spinning over the city with his "little wife." They will probably do some road riding shortly.

Harry Tanner, an excellent bass singer, is being heard at the Auditorium and Plaza. He gives artistic songs which the patrons of these houses readily appreciate.

The Casino gave the Military Field Mass a run of a week and it received hearty approval of the large numbers of clergy who witnessed these performances. Owing to the lowness of the roof over the altar the Mass itself could not be well depicted, but President Taft, Mgr. Russell, Father McDonnell and others participating are well featured. The chief point that this film shows, and which was the primary idea in giving this Military Field Mass, was the hearty approval of the public as shown by the large crowds that covered the grounds around the Washington Monument. The Ortho Company has made a feature of this exceptional concourse of people, more than 40,000 strong, including Knights of Columbus, Sunday-school children, Spanish war veterans, guard of honor of the President and various church societies. Since this is the first reel to be displayed, it has some defects which will be corrected in following reels. Special Catholic music appropriate to this film was played by Miss Jennie Elmore.

LETTER FROM LONDON

Office of the "News,"
8 Sherwood St., Piccadilly Circus, W.

Gee whiz, but somebody is doing well out of the Coronation! Wednesday was the first day of display of Kinemacolor's record of the ceremonies at the Scala, and the beautiful entrance hall of that theater was thronged with Dukes and Duchesses and all the cream of Society—with a very big "S"—in the evening. At least, that's what the audience looked like, and there is no doubt that the Scala has a clientele which for wealth and social position is unrivalled by any other picture theater in this country. They were turning away good money at the Scala on Wednesday evening—a thing which I am very doubtful has ever happened before at that beautiful but previously extremely unlucky establishment. If you knew the Scala's history your opinion of Kinemacolor as a drawing force would be increased a 1000 per cent by the fact I have just stated. All sorts of attractions and all sorts of actors have failed to make good at the theater, but Kinemacolor has broken its run of bad luck, and the Scala should in future take the prominent place to which its unrivalled beauty entitles it. One thing is certain, Kinemacolor is a success. Don't be surprised if it shortly becomes the rage of London; every member of the audience (and every seat has been occupied during recent shows) means at least three future patrons; that, at least, is my experience.

I don't know that it is necessary to deal in extenso with the Kinemacolor Coronation pictures, for I understand your market was supplied even before the films were put on at the Scala, and you will have to see the films yourself and be in a position to form your own opinion. In the comprehensiveness of its views of London's preparation for the great occasion, and of the processions themselves, it is all that could be desired and is a record of a great occasion which will be of the greatest value in future years, as well as of remarkable entertaining powers at the present.

My prediction that the over-elaborate police regulations would have the effect of frightening people from the route, to the indirect benefit of the cinematograph theaters, was fully borne out by events. The enthusiastic souls who rose considerably before the lark and camped out in the street for some five or six hours awaiting the procession, were annoyed by the sight of others strolling up ten minutes before the show began and getting an equally good view. Thousands stayed at home or went to the seaside and country and are now enjoying the sight of the procession in hundreds of cinematograph theaters throughout the country. A deputation from the trade ought to wait upon the Chief of Police Commissioner and thank him for his barricades and warning notices.

* * * *

The general level of the quality in the Coronation films is surprisingly good, considering the not too excellent weather conditions; the same remark applies to the films of the Naval Review. Orders were in most cases supplied to schedule time, though I did hear of one exhibitor from Wales who waited some eighteen hours for his copy and then went out and got one at a rival establishment.

Barker's dormitory worked admirably, though I understand the worthy head of the firm's costume created a sensation in Soho Square when he made a trip across that thoroughfare after a hurried uprising. This is a staff story, however, and may go down better with the customary seasoning.

* * * *

A fund has been started for the benefit of the widow and children of the late Mr. Thomas Clegg, and is being generously responded to by the trade of the country. There must be many in the States to whom Mr. Clegg was known either personally or by reputation. His remarkably able writings on the educational side of cinematography were, I know, widely circulated there, and there must be many to whom they appealed strongly and who would be glad of an opportunity to recognize the valuable pioneer work he did. Such recognition could not take a better form than a subscription to the above fund, and any donations which are sent to me at the above address will be acknowledged both in the News and in the English trade papers.

* * * *

A healthy sign, pointing to an increased realization of the importance of every branch of production by the home makers, is the recent debating of the question of plots and the recompense of their writers. Mostly, writers with ambitions above the 10s. 6d., which used to be the price paid for every plot, good, bad or indifferent, in this country, have submitted their efforts chiefly to American or Continental producers. Nowadays, however, they find the English producers willing to pay a first-class price for a first-class suggestion, and this is another indication of the greatly improved methods of our makers. They have started later than their foreign competitors, but that is frequently the way in this more or less slow-going—according to American ideas—country. We were very slow in developing the picture theater, but the delay is more than compensated for by the thoroughness with which it was done in the end. Travelled people tell us the English cinematograph theaters are all round the best in the world; may it not turn out that our films are destined to achieve a similar leading position?

When the average member of the English trade reads about American conditions, the thing that strikes him as most preposterous about your methods of business, is the efforts made by various factors to collar all the business for themselves. Such attempts have, it is true, been made here in a tentative kind of way, but have failed ignominiously. In America they seem to have succeeded to the extent of depriving the showman of a free choice of program. The English exhibitor who was told that if he showed "Imps" or "Flying A's" or "Eclairs" or "Italas," he would be barred from Vitagraph, Selig and Essanay productions would not, I think, sit down tamely and content himself with a program made up of only half the world's productions; he would kick till he got an open market. One of the advantages of living in a Free Trade country is that attempts to corner this or that article are at once regarded as a piece of presumption not to be tolerated; with no tariff as a shelter under which the monopolist can work his sweet will, we have not got into the habit of accepting such methods of business. It was tried in soap and the result was a boycott which cost the would-be "cornerers" many thousands of pounds.

In the film business we have a free choice of Trust and Independent goods, our programs are the best in the world, and we need not fear losing the distinction to the States until that country also enjoys an open market. Whether that is ever likely to come about is for those who know the inside conditions of your trade to say. B. A.

PHILLIPS SMALLEY AND THE REX POSTER

A man is known by the company he keeps. More so is a film manufacturer. The Rex company not only has made Rex known—because of it and its work Rex has grown and shone and shown—shown that "the playing's the thing." In the Rex firmament of stars shining more brightly than the others is Phillips Smalley—and we think he's a comet.

Phillips Smalley has proved to us by his work that he is a true artist, with everything an artist possesses but the artistic temperament. For Smalley is one of those few actors who are human beings, and not perambulating dramatic machines. Therefore his work is human, the last touch to the finished product of excellent work.

Rex has put Smalley's face on a poster, which, even aside from this important fact, deserves some comment. Extraordinary film posters are sufficiently few and far between to cause one that is unusually good to attract some attention. But if posters were as a rule all to be expected of them this particular one would still be conspicuous.

Rex is on the right track in everything, as we have said several times; in management, in method, in its playing and in its posters. And Phillips Smalley, whose work has characterized Rex for strong, forceful acting, has a new and different success—in a poster. His face tells a strong story, shows individuality; the exhibitors and the public have learned to know his skill and the poster should only stimulate interest in him and Rex.

As long as Rex is Rex, as long as Phillips Smalley is with Rex, we expect great things—and have had them. And on the strength of the foregoing we expect great pictures until the millennium.

AN IMPORTANT INVENTION

From Washington, D. C., comes an inventor who has just patented an improvement to projecting machines which will perform a service that has long been desired. It is a simple device, consisting of a special lens suspended from a rod attached to the side of the lamp house, a small hole directly opposite the arc light generated by the carbons and an exterior blurred image. Perhaps the hole is the chief idea, for through this aperture passes a picture of the position of the electrodes on the suspended lens, which in turn throws an enlarged reflection on any convenient screen. There have been some and there will be others who have exclaimed, "Why didn't I think of that?" or even, "Why, I thought of the reflection, but not the hole and the lens!" Yet here is Sydney Julian Jacobson who has accomplished this and he is going to make some money out of it and incidentally some fame.

Certainly every up-to-date picture man will be glad to secure something which will tell him so easily how those troublesome carbons are acting and located. Then by watching this image or reflection adjustments can be quickly made and a continuous clear projection maintained on the picture screen. Even the sparks flying from the electrodes are pictured. The operator will no longer be compelled to stop his machine in order to reset the carbons or see how they are placed. This inexpensive device will permit this to be done without going to the lamp house.

With the proper placing of the lens opposite the hole in the side of the lamp box the image can be thrown to the side or front, for the arm on which is suspended the lens is adjustable. A screen may be attached to the apparatus or the reflection may be thrown on cardboard tacked to a side wall of the operator's room; or even the side of another light box may form the screen when two machines are being used.

This improvement comes not only as a need to the picture man, but it gives an equally important service to spot-light projection and colored light effects so much used on the dramatic and operatic stage to-day.

Simple as this device appears—after you know it—Mr. Jacobson has been working on it for the past few years. The greater part of the time has been consumed in securing the patent—convincing officials of its originality. Nearly two years have elapsed since application was made and the patent was only granted on July 4th. Encouraging offers have come to Mr. Jacobson to sell his invention and it is quite possible more flattering ones will be thrust upon him when

Figures 1 and 2 are the way the young daughter of our Washington Correspondent saw the machine the cinematograph machine makers know of this device. As he views the matter now, the young inventor wants to look after his own manufacturing for a while and to this end he has received good financial support in St. Louis, where the factory will probably be located. Mr. John H. Brininga is associated in this new business venture.

The Plaza has taken the lead in Washington to show the usefulness of the Jacobson invention and other managers are desirous of securing the device as soon as it is put on the market. Just at present there is some excitement in the Capital City in motion picture business, but Mr. Jacobson, who has been operator and manager in that industry in Washington for some years past, is taking his praises very calmly. He will leave the city some time this month to visit theater and picturer managers to place his invention on a commercial and economic basis. Progressive men will welcome this improvement and give success to the inventor.

Exactly what will be the purchasing price of this device cannot be determined. "While I am not planning to lose money on my invention," said Mr. Jacobson, "I will place it as reasonable as possible before the public. It has been a necessity for a long time and I am anxious that the manager with small capital shall have the same privilege in securing this device as the man with plenty of money. It is an invention for the people—the spectators as well as the manager."

THE SOLAX COMPANY

"A few Solax Western pictures"—While waiting for the big military series the Solax Company are taking at the Government post, Ft. Meyer, Va., this ever-watchful company discovered the Cheyenne Days Company troop of cowboys had an idle week in their forty-week engagement with the Orpheum Circuit. A contract was quickly made and soon the champion ropers and broncho busters were before the Solax camera. This troop consists of Art Boden, the champion lariat man of Wyoming; Otto Kline, the champion broncho buster; Big Murphy, champion steer thrower, and the celebrated cowboys, Greg and Earl Hornbrook.

Solax has never gone in for Western pictures, having consistently put out a Wednesday Comedy and a Friday Military, but they certainly made a hit by getting the Cheyenne Days Company.

One of these pictures actually shows the training and riding of a wild horse. One of the thrilling incidents of another picture is the rescue of a girl from outlaws by the great rider, Otto Kline. He actually picks the girl up from the ground and carries her off while riding at full speed. No better horsemanship or exciting incident has ever been shown in a film.

The Crown Theater, Mobile, Ala.

The opening of the New Crown Theater was a conspicuous event in the history of Mobile amusements. When the doors of the beautiful new edifice, located on Dauphin between Jackson and Joachim streets, were thrown open to the public, the people of Mobile were permitted for the first time to enjoy a moving-picture performance in a building especially constructed for that purpose—beautiful, sanitary and refined in appearance.

The entrance through a handsome arcade embracing almost the whole width of the building, is especially attractive and pleasing to the eye. At the left is a costly electric piano and at the right one's eye rests upon a sanitary drinking fountain furnishing an unlimited supply of ice water.

There are three divisions to the steps leading into the auditorium, the middle division being used for the entrances, and the other two for exits. The exits are complete and comply in every respect with all fire ordinances. The fire exit on the left leading to Jackson street consists of doors equipped with special panic locks, all that is necessary to open them being a pressure against the rods stretched across them.

The seating capacity of the new house is about 400. There are twenty-seven rows of seats, fourteen seats to the row, the whole divided into two sections which rise in even tiers from the orchestra to the back of the auditorium, insuring a good view from all portions of the house.

The theater is well heated by gas-steam-heated radiators situated in different parts of the house.

The lighting is perfect in every detail. In the front arcade, where one enters walking on a handsomely tiled floor ornamented with a mammoth crown, a look upward makes an impression pleasing to the eye. Dazzling tungsten fixtures set in uniform lily design under eight-foot pendants compel admiration. The lily design prevails throughout the fixtures of the theater. On the side walls of the auditorium are several art glass light fixtures of a subdued shade for the convenience of those entering and leaving during the performance. The lights on the stage and footing the orchestra box are appropriate. At the right exit is a ladies' toilet, while at the left a stairway leads to the splendidly equipped operating rooms above.

The stage is commodious and the scenery and electrical equipment on the stage, as well as in every other part of the structure, has been thoroughly inspected and approved. The curtain is of asbestos, fireproof and very handsomely finished in old gold.

The ventilating system is the most complete and modern in the city, consisting of two 70-inch blowers propelled with a 10-horsepower encased motor, furnishing a continual supply of fresh air to all parts of the theater every two-and-one-half minutes. The system is lacking in no detail that goes to make it up-to-date and sanitary.

The operating room is encased with asbestos pressed boards one-quarter of an inch thick, making it thoroughly fireproof. All lights in the theater are handled from the operating room and the stage by a system of remote control. By this method practically all danger from fire is eliminated.

The price of admission will be five cents. Each performance consists of three films, changed daily and produced by the independent manufacturers of the world. Hours of performance will be from 11 a. m. to 10.30 p. m. daily. An orchestra of four pieces will furnish music from 2.30 to 5.30 and from 6.30 to 10.30 p. m.

KINEMACOLOR

Kinemacolor is derived from the Greek word "Kinea" meaning motion. Therefore, Kinemacolor means color in motion. But it means far more than that. It means that for the first time in the world's history, after accepting seventy-five years of photographic tradition, Messrs. Urban-Smith have backtracked, finding the real trail, have blazed a way for the introduction of the world's wonder of modern times, which may be termed the eighth wonder of the world. In photographing nature's colors in all their beautiful shades, hues and tones so that the auditor looking on a Kinemacolor picture loses sight of the picture and is entirely impressed with the reality.

Like many other great discoveries, Kinemacolor was found in the simplicity of the method. Some peculiar occultism seemed to permeate the intellects of two of the world's famous authors, who, in a measure, must have anticipated Kinemacolor. William Shakespeare, when in "Hamlet" he penned, "To hold as 'twere the mirror up to nature," must have been wrestling with a wraith-like presonality of the coming of Kinemacolor. Bernard Shaw, the celebrated Irish dramatist, and probably the greatest living satirist, now that the marvelous W. J. Gilbert has passed to that bourne from which no traveler returns, is responsible for the famous saying, "There is no truth save the art of the camera," and Shaw when he penned these lines was miles from the truth.

Strange as it may seem, the two great wonders of the discovery of Kinemacolor are that for the first time in the world's history, black and white have been discovered. The veriest tyro gazing on a sheet holding Kinemacolor wonders cannot help but be astounded at the beauties of the sunny white and sable black and the marvelous stereoscopic photography produced. Photographers have been grouping around in stygian darkness in hapes of some day being able to find this philosopher's stone of photography, which depends entirely on light and shade, and to be effective must have a pure white and an ebony black in order to reproduce properly the lights and shadows and to drift from the reality of the tones into the ghost-like personality of the halftones, gradually dying away like an angel's whisper on an evening breeze.

This philosopher's stone was discovered by Kinemacolor for the "art preservative of all arts"—photography. Kinemacolor has no stronger adherent in civilization than His Majesty King George V. of England, who has ordered pictures made of the forty days' festivities surrounding the coronation of the ruler of the British Empire and its colonies. These films will be placed in the archives of the government in the Tower of London, and future generations will have an opportunity of seeing in reality the actual scenes and incidents that went to commemorate the crowning of King George V. of England, and the forthcoming ceremony, which takes place in October, at which time he will be made Emperor of India. The celebrated Indian Durbar, the most gorgeous pageant in the world, will take place commemorating this event.

J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that he has just sold to the People's Recreation Company, of this city, 294 opera chairs and a new Powers No. 6 moving picture machine, to be installed in their new theater in Brooklyn.

Chicago News Notes

The Columbia Theater at Clark and Division Streets, has been taken over by Father Plough, of Anti-Trust fame, and he is demonstrating how far superior good moving pictures are to vaudeville as a magnet for drawing crowds. It is advertised as the coolest place on Clark Street and lives up to its press agent's prophecy: three reels of good Independent pictures and two songs, one illustrated and one spot by two good singers furnish the program which is packing this house these warm nights.

* * * *

The Boston Theater, on Madison Street, had a special feature this week in the "Night Raiders," and from indications were doing the top business in this busy photo play block. I understand the owners of the picture bought the house outright for $100 a day, and were making money at that price.

* * * *

The World's Best Film Company, who have control of the moving picture, "The Crusaders," have opened offices at Room 808-810 Boyce Building on Dearborn Street, and Manager Tom Quill is busy disposing of state rights. We are all invited to see the pictures this week, and are anxiously awaiting their exhibition.

* * * *

Despite the hot weather, the five-cent theaters in outlying districts are holding their own, and many houses that closed during the summer months heretofore are now open and doing business.

Ed Miller, business manager of Local No. 2, I. A. I. S. E. operators' Union, left for Niagara Falls last Saturday as their delegate to the International Convention. He is in the company of Joe Friend (best known as Dutch) one of the best as well as most popular operators in Chicago. I only hope Dutch don't try to sing at the convention. He has some pair of pipes, believe me.

Saw some very good Independent pictures this week. Among the best of the week were "Fate" by the Rex Know How, which deals neatly with a gentlemanly burglar story. None of the rough stuff, mind you, but put on in the "Know How" style and cleverly done by Phillip Smalley. "For the Queen's Honor," the best yet Imp. Imp, you are excelling yourself, and that's going some. Photography, costuming, detail and acting all up to the minute.

* * * *

Selig's "Sacrifice to Civilization" this week was well put on but very reminiscent of a Biograph seen some time ago.

* * * *

"To the Aid of Stonewall Jackson," a Kalem, was very good as a patriotic offering but did not compare with Thanhouser's "Declaration of Independence" or Vitagraph's "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

* * * *

Kinemacolor is making quite an impression in Chicago. The exhibitions given at the Sherman House with the Coronation pictures showed plainly that this new process is fast becoming a reality, and I know of two different bankers here who have taken considerable stock in the company, who are noted for careful scrutiny in investments.

"THE LINEMAN"

The Imp release of July 27, "The Lineman," involved the hiring of a special locomotive for the use of an agonized husband hastening to the rescue of his wife and child, whose lives are menaced by two desperate burglars, who are trying to batter down a door and steal. There is a telephone conversation in which is depicted fear and horror as the husband listens to the appeal of his wife miles away. The telephone lineman is sent out to locate "trouble" and he discovers attempted crime while perched on a pole with his instrument strapped to his ear. The husband is speeding homeward on the fast engine, urging the driver to greater speed, and the man on the pole descends and presses an automobile into service, arriving in time to assist in the arrest of the miscreants and liberate the fainting wife and frightened child. The story is one of thrilling interest, tense moments and exciting situations, with right triumphing and a pretty little pathetic scene as a finale.

PICTURE GARDEN OPENS

Crowds Visit Baltimore's Newest Moving-Picture Parlor

With every one of its 400 seats occupied, the first programme of moving pictures and illustrated songs was given in the Picture Garden, Lexington, between Charles and Liberty, the latest moving-picture enterprise in Baltimore, recently. The programme consisted of a reel of pictures depicting the well-known cartoon characters, Mutt and Jeff, in their humorous antics. Several other reels were given, and Mr. Archie Lloyd rendered new and catchy songs.

The new Picture Garden is situated on the south side of Lexington street, in the very center of the shopping district. It is an admirable place to seek a few minutes' entertainment, and at the same time escape from the heat of the city. The entrance is a wide and roomy lobby and inside the doors there is a large space that will be used as a waiting-room.

The auditorium is beautifully decorated in green and gold. Along the walls are twelve handsome panels, representing spring scenes. The dome of the auditorium represents the blue sky of summer. It is covered with latticework, upon which a green grapevine clings. The dome is illuminated with a faint blue light from concealed electric bulbs.

At different points along the latticework are concealed bells operated by electricity, upon which a musician renders melodies from the stage. The sky effect can also be changed from that of day to night. The screen is a large mirrored glass plate.

Mr. H. A. Fitzgerald is proprietor and owner and Mr. Edwin R. Price is manager. The architect was Mr. Paul Emmart and the decorations were installed by Emmart & Quartley. The management will show only first-run pictures, and on every Saturday afternoon they will have an entirely new sketch of Mutt and Jeff.

Haviland Moving Picture Pianists' Album

The F. B. Haviland Music Publishing Co. have recently published an album of music appropriate for the use of pianists in motion picture houses and have selected a list of music that will surely appeal to the piano players. This volume contains sixty-four pages of all classes of melodies, adapted to evry class of picture and brilliantly but simply arranged by Eugene Platzman. The price is 50 cents. Haviland is always up to date and their offices and salesrooms at 125 West Thirty-seventh Street, New York City, are a rendezvous for musical people.

F. B. Haviland

Among their recent song successes are: "Can't You Take It Back and Change It for a Boy," "I've Got Your Number," "Cupid's I. O. U.," "I'm Crazy 'Bout the Turkey Trot," "We All Fall," "Honey Love," "There's a Dixie Girl Who's Longing for a Yankee Doodle Boy," "Motor King," "That Was Before I Met You," "Peggy Gray," "I'm Glad You're Sorry," "I Keep My Wife in the City and Make Love to Her Myself."

Chas. K. Harris' Big Song Hit

While Mr. Harris is touring Europe for the first time enjoying the sights and scenery, his office staff, from the manager, Mr. Meyer Cohen, down to the smallest boy, have been hustling like grim death landing a hit for Mr. Harris during his absence and they have succeeded well, as the song is without a doubt one of the biggest hits that Mr. Harris has had since his famous "After the Ball," and one has only to sing over the chorus of "Don't Blame Me For Lovin' You" (which is reproduced on this page) to be convinced of this fact. It is one of the catchiest things that Mr. Harris has ever written, and, furthermore, it is a little different from his regular run of ballads. It is said that the slides of this song, which were posed by Scott and Van Altena, under the personal supervision of Mr. Harris before he left for the other side, are the greatest slides that have ever been turned out by this house. It is a well-known fact that as a rule the songs are changed nightly in New York, but this song has been kept on wherever it has been sung a whole week, which shows that the managers and the public know a good song when they hear it, and it is indeed a pleasure to hear the different audiences join in the chorus of this song five and six times, the chorus being repeated at every performance. In New York City one has only to go where music is played or sung and the only thing you hear is "Don't Blame Me For Lovin' You." We have no doubt when Mr. Harris returns from abroad the early part of September he will be received by a brass band playing "Don't Blame Me For Lovin' You," as by that time it will be the only song all the bands will be playing.

Chas. K. Harris

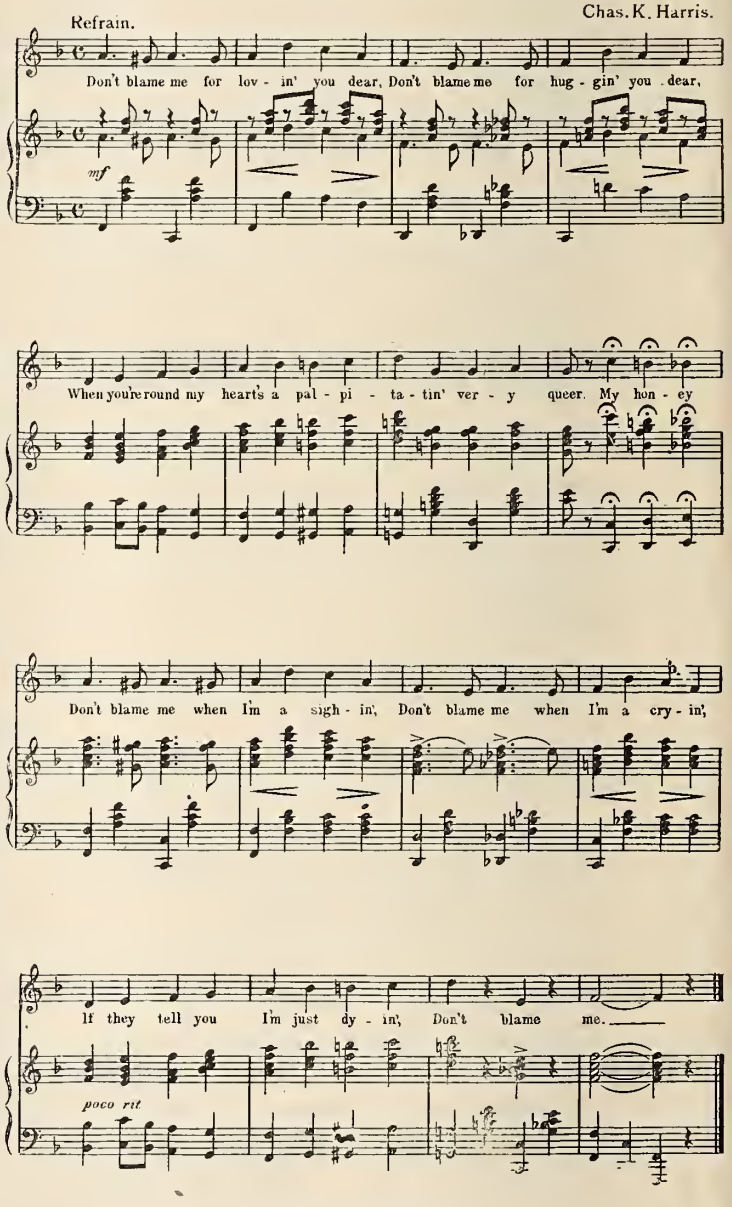
Don't Blame Me For Lovin' You.

Chas. K. Harris.

Refrain.



Don't blame me for lov - in' you dear, Don't blame me for hug - gin' you dear, mf
When you're round my heart's a pal - pi - ta - tin' ver - y queer. My hon - ey

"THE RANCHMAN'S NERVE"

American Release July 17th

Fred Peters lived in the mountains with his mother and sister; always shiftless and improvident, he turns a deaf ear to their pleadings to settle down to some useful occupation. Unknown to them, he holds up every lone rider he sees coming down the mountain road until he earns for himself the sobriquet, "the terror of the mountains."

On the morning that the story opens he leaves his home and intercepts the express rider on the lonely mountain road, making away with a rich haul. The express rider hurries to the sheriff's office and notifies him; a posse is formed, and they start in pursuit. Safely hidden among the rocks, the "terror" fires, wounding one of the deputies in the arm. After this catastrophe the posse return, their ardor cooled to take the "bad man" of the mountains. Arrived at the sheriff's office, the express rider binds up the injured arm. The sheriff announced that he needs a man of nerve to lead the posse and the express rider agrees to find the man. Going to the general store, where the boys are loitering, he takes a corner of his handkerchief in his mouth and dares any man to fight him with a bowie, holding the other corner of the handkerchief in his mouth. Nobody accepts the challenge. Bob Steele comes up and offers to fight him any style. Taking the other corner of the handkerchief in his mouth, he attacks the express rider so fiercely that he is compelled to drop his end, leaving Bob the winner in the unique duel. They ask him to lead the posse, and he willingly agrees to go.

Again the posse arrive at the scene of the holdup, and Fred Peters resting his rifle on a rock, fires and kills a deputy. Steele turns to the posse and urges them to go after the desperado. The men hesitate, and Bob, drawing his gun from its holster, throwing it to the ground, declares "I'll bring him in, single-handed, without a gun." Leaving the posse he enters the dense thicket leading up to the outlaw's retreat. Fred Peters, thinking he has again halted pursuit, caches his rifle in a crevice in the rocks, and, taking up the bag of gold, returns to his home. Bob Steele has picked up his trail and follows him relentlessly, now standing upright in the open and now crawling upon hands and knees through the dense underbrush and over the dangerous brow of the cliffs. He comes to the crevice in the rocks and finds fresh evidence of the outlaw's recent presence, and, with the instinct of an Indian scout, he follows the trail.

When he arrives at the outlaw's home he meets Lottie Peters and explains his mission. While he is talking Fred comes out and covers him with his gun. Lottie throws herself in front of Steele and Fred Peters is halted in his murderous design. Bob Steele, always fearless, steps from behind her and, pointing to his heart, dares the outlaw to shoot him. All this is disconcerting to Fred, who does not wish to commit murder in the presence of his mother and sister. At the psychological moment Bob springs on the outlaw and, wresting his gun from him, he turns the tables completely. Covering him with the gun he quietly remarks, "For the sake of these women, I'll give you one hour to get across the line."

After his departure Steele examines the gun and, throwing it down, he starts down the mountain trail. Lottie picks up her brother's gun and watches the ranchman out of sight. Instead of obeying Steele's mandate, the outlaw hurries to where his rifle is cached, and lies in wait for the fearless man. Steele, unconscious of his danger, stops to drink at a mountain stream. He is followed by Lottie, who has a presentiment of danger, for she knows her brother's treacherous nature. She sees her brother on the cliff above and utters a cry of warning. Fred's rifle flashes and the ranchman's hat is shot from his head. Almost simultaneously the sharp crack of her gun is heard and mortally wounded, Fred falls over the cliff to the table rock below. Without a word of remorse, or even a backward glance, Lottie wends her way with the man whose life she has saved back to her home and waiting mother.

"WHEN EAST COMES WEST"

American Release, July 20th

Joe Ellison, the young foreman of Lazy Ranch, finds the routine of ranch life rather irksome, and seeing a matrimonial advertisement in an Eastern newspaper, he answers it. When the answer to him arrives, accompanied by a photograph of the lady, he is subjected to a great deal of chaffing by the boys, but accepts it all in a very good-natured way. The ranch cook essays some good advice, but the foreman is determined, and sends for the lady. On the day of her expected arrival the foreman departs to meet the train and, during his absence, the boys prepare to give the bride and groom a rousing reception. With studious care a sign is made, "Welcome to Lazy Ranch," and enough rice is procured to feed a Chinese regiment.

In the meantime, Joe has met his correspondent, and finds her even more beautiful and winsome than the photograph. They are mutually pleased, and, entering the buckboard, they drive to the office of the Justice of the Peace and are married. Joe has forgotten the ring, but the bride supplies the deficiency.

Driving home they are greeted by a shower of rice and the bride is established as the mistress of the ranch. The cook's wife has previously held this position and, feeling that the bride has usurped her rights, she starts to make things unpleasant for the Eastern girl.

On the morning that Joe starts for the round-up things have become unbearable for the foreman's wife, and she determines to return to her home. The cook finds her crying, and learns of her homesickness, and offers to drive her to the gulch, where she can catch the Overland train. He is trying to comfort her when his wife accidentally witnesses the little scene and misconstrues their actions for love. Her suspicions become a certainty when the cook drives up with the buckboard, and the foreman's wife, coming out of the ranch house, hands her a note addressed to Joe, and then drives away with the cook. The cook's wife runs to the corral and, mounting her horse, rides rapidly to the round-up and, finding Joe, announces, "Your wife ran away with my husband." Without waiting to hear more Joe starts in pursuit of the pair and, coming upon them by the roadside, he ropes the cook and his wife and ties them up to a tree.

Leaving them to whatever Fate may have in store for them, he sets out for the round-up, with a heavy heart, for he had learned to love his winsome wife with a whole-souled passion characteristic of the man. He meets the cook's wife, who now delivers the note to him. Tearing it open he eagerly scans the page and learns the truth. He hastily returns to the tree, liberates his prisoners, and tries to explain to his injured wife the cause of his jealousy. The cook is treated to a lecture from his wife's vitrolic tongue, as she attacks him with both fists. The foreman's wife promises to forgive her husband if he will take her East, which he agrees to do, and they renew their vows with a perfect understanding of each other.

A comedy of hearty laughs, carrying with it the moral, "the only people you can part are those who do not belong together."

"SERGEANT DILLON'S BRAVERY"

Solax Release July 21st

The routine at Fort Winton is interrupted by a message from the paymaster stating he would be at the post that day to audit the accounts. The news is least welcome to Lieutenant Mason, who, as disbursing officer, has charge of the funds. His sporting proclivities have led him to use the funds entrusted to him. He decides to wager all on one cast of the dice. Taking the balance of cash on hand he goes to a gambling resort, where he loses all.

The lieutenant's loss is witnessed by Sergeant Dillon, which heightens the bad blood already existing between the two men by reason of the Lieutenant's attention to Nina, who is Sergeant Dillon's sweetheart. The paymaster entrusts the lieutenant with the money he has brought for the deposit in the safe. Mason takes advantage of a chance to rob the safe and so maneuvers that the sergeant will be blamed for the theft. The theft is discovered, and the lieutenant's scheme of fixing the blame on Sergeant Dillon is successful. The sergeant is placed under arrest just as word is received of an Indian outbreak. Boots and saddle is hurriedly sounded, and the troops rush away from the camp.

Dillon's little sweetheart heard the news of his arrest, comes to the guard house, and releasing him, gives him her horse. Dillon gallops after his troops, but arrives just as the engagement is closing. Lieutenant Mason is shot by one of the Indian stragglers. He is rescued by Sergeant Dillon and brought back to the post in a dying condition. Realizing that death is near, Lieutenant Mason makes a confession, exonerating Sergeant Dillon, and he is restored to the arms of his sweetheart.

ALL ABOARD FOR RENO

Solax Release, July 19th

Two people, a Mr. Biff and a Mrs. Howard, go to a photographer's and have some pictures taken. After they are finished the packages are given to a messenger, who makes a mistake in delivering the pictures, and Mr. Biff gets Mrs. Howard's picture and Mrs. Howard gets Mr. Biff's picture. The pictures are found by Mrs. Biff and Mr. Howard. The resultant complications can be imagined.

Then follows a still hunt on the part of the supposedly wronged husband and wife —Mrs. Biff and Mr. Howard—all over town. Finally they locate Mr. Biff and Mrs. Howard in a restaurant, which they happened by strange coincidence to enter together. The enraged husband and wife sail in and make a scene in the restaurant, telling their supposed recreant spouses that they now have them right, and that they are going to get a divorce.

The next scene shows the quartet at the railroad station, getting aboard the train for Reno. As they are about to enter the train the photographer's messenger rushes up, and beginning to cry, tells them that he is very sorry that he made the mistake of delivering the wrong pictures to the addresses. After explanations are offered everything is merry and Mr. and Mrs. Biff and Mr. and Mrs. Howard go off arm in arm, well satisfied with the way things have turned out.

CHARLEY HAS A MANUSCRIPT TO SELL

Eclair Release July 17th

Charley seems engulfed in a sea of financial difficulties. Creditors are beseiging him on every side. In desperation he tries to sell a manuscript if possible. He calls on a producing manager, but happens in at a time when the latter is in conversation with a young lady and is promptly ejected for his pains, but not until he manages to take with him a photo of the lady in question for use later on. Charley now persists in dogging the manager's every step, but with little immediate success except to make the said producer's life one of abject misery. As a last resort, Charley threatens to show the young lady's photo to the manager's wife which brings about an immediate invitation for Charley to read his drama to the manager and his family. Many amusing incidents follow in rapid succession throughout the entire picture.

TEDDY'S THREE DUELS

Teddy was born with a strong personality and possessed great personal magnetism. Unconsciously and without effort he acquired the friendship of every man he met while the gentler sex simply raved over him. Unlike Don Juan, his intentions were at all times honorable, yet his attractiveness sometimes caused him both mental and physical pain. On one occasion, with which this story deals, a woman of mature years, her pretty daughter and the servant of the house all chose to fall in love with our gay young Lothario. Straightaway their respective husbands and sweethearts evinced their displeasure and Charley was the recipient of three unique challenges to as many duels. Disdaining to use the ancestral weapons, one insisted waging his battle on bicycles, another selected roller skates and the third preferred the water.

THE SMUGGLER

Thanhouser Release, July 25th

An old man has an ingenious plan to circumvent the customs officials, and for a time it works like a charm. Officers and sailors on various transatlantic liners, who are in the gang, are given in Europe rare gems and laces which they are to bring to America.

The ordinary methods of smuggling by members of the crews being well guarded against, the men do not dare to bring the valuables into port with them. But they encase them in lifebelts, and on nearing the coast near Fire Island they keep a close watch out for the racing yacht which the old man owns. The rest is easy. The lifebelt is slipped overboard, the men on the boat pick it up and land at their little village, from where the jewels are taken to the city.

The old man has two nieces, who are orphans, and dependent upon him. He decides that the elder girl shall take part in the crime, hoping that if anything goes wrong she may be the one to suffer, rather than he. And although the girl did not like the task, the fact that smuggling was a crime was not thoroughly clear to her, and for the sake of her little sister she consents to take the boat out and pick up the jewels.

Unfortunately the United States District Attorney's attention has been directed to the gang. An enemy of the old man sends an anonymous letter, calling the law's notice to the boat, and a detective is sent to investigate. He manages to secure a position on the boat as sailor, and his very first cruise proves that the charges were well founded.

The detective and his police allies confront the old man just after the jewels have been turned over to him. The girl is in tears when the detective appears. But he, from his place of concealment, has heard enough to convince him that she was not a willing participant in the plot.

The two are arrested, but the detective, at the girl's plea, takes care of the little sister. He places her with his old nurse, who owns a farm in the country, and who promises to give the child a mother's attention. Then the detective tells the district attorney the facts in the case and pleads for the release of the girl. He shows that the blame was not really hers, but belonged to the wicked relative who practically forced her to commit wrong. And the law was merciful.

Some time later the detective met his one time prisoner again, but this time he was the prisoner, for she had bound him with the invisible chains of love.

A DOLL'S HOUSE.

Thanhouser Release July 28th.

Nora, the only child of a kindly old man, never "grew up" so far as he could see. He treated her "like a doll," as she said later, when her eyes were opened, but her girlhood was happy and carefree. She never had opinions, those of her father were enough for her, and when he suggested that she marry Torvald Helmer, a young man of probity, she was not consulted. Neither did she object, for that is not one of a doll's privileges.

The husband, as did the father, treated Nora like a doll. It never occurred to him that she was a being with a mind and intelligence, but he was fond of her, in his own superior, condescending way. When he was taken sick, he thought it was very kind of her old father to give them the money that paid for a health trip to Italy. He did not know that his "Doll Wife" had borrowed the cash from a money lender, and to get it had forged her father's name. Her excuse, perfectly reasonable to the Doll's mind, although not legal, was that her father would have signed had it not been that he was fatally ill at the time. And the money was needed, as the doctors had told her that without the trip Torvald would certainly die.

But the artifice of the "Doll Wife" was a closely guarded secret for many years. She worked late at night sewing to pay off the load of debt under which she labored. And the years passed on, and children came, and Torvald grew in wealth and knowledge, but he never once realized that Nora had troubles and anxiety, simply because she bore her cross with a smiling face.

When Torvald became the manager of a bank the crisis came. One of the clerks was lazy and irresponsible and the new manager discharged him. And he was the man who had loaned Nora the money.

He saw a chance to get his place back and called upon Nora, threatening her with exposure unless he was restored to duty. Then, for the first time, she realized that she had committed, what in the eyes of the law was a crime. In her pitiful, doll-like way she tried to get her husband to restore the clerk to duty, but was rebuffed. For he could not see what right she had to interfere in his business. He was not really angry, just provoked.

The clerk carried out his threat, but Nora for a time was able to keep her husband from reading the letter. Then she decided to let the exposure come, believing that her husband, who had guided and petted her for years, would, to clear her, take the blame upon himself. But Torvald showed that she had judged him wrongly. His terror was aroused, not for fear of consequences to her, but because of what might happen to himself. And the eyes of the "Doll Wife" were opened.

When the danger of exposure had passed away, through the eleventh hour repentance of the clerk, Torvald was ready to forgive and forget. But Nora was not. She saw how her life had been spoiled from infancy, how she had been suppressed and ignored, and resolutely left her home to start life anew and alone.

The pleadings of her husband and the thoughts of her children did not move her. They were all a part of the "Doll's House" and its furniture, and they had no part in the life of a woman, so she put them away from her. And Torvald, too late, realized the fault was his. She tells him that some day she may return "if the miracle happens, making me a different woman and you a different man." He lives on, striving for the miracle.

SHERLOCK HOMES, JR.

Rex Release, July 20th

It is a well known fact that detectives are born. Indeed, every boy that is born has the detective instinct and the desire to be a Sherlock Holmes. Little Sherlock Holmes, Jr., reads of the doughty doings of his hero-god, and at once determines to become a detective himself. Providence favors him by at once giving him a mystery to solve. His father has noticed that in some weird, unaccountable fashion the whiskey in the decanter is ever vanishing, and father swears he doesn't drink it as fast as all that. So Sherlock Holmes, Jr., assigns himself the task of discovering who tampers with his father's soothing beverage. Concealed behind a table, he sees Bridget, the cook, come in and at once proceed to get on the outside of a man's size pull on the flask. At once the embryo detective makes his report to his father, with the astounding solution of the mystery. The father decides to use Dr. Brown's Sure Cure for the Liquor Habit on the cook, and obtains a bottle of the fluid. This he puts in the room near the whiskey, intending to pour some in the bottle a little later. Sherlock Holmes, Jr., discovers the bottle, and follows the "Do It Now" maxim. There are friends visiting the house at the time, who are sitting on the lawn with his parents, awaiting tea, which the maid is to bring them. Sherlock, Jr., pours a goodly quantity of the fluid into the tea. One of the results of taking the liquid is falling into a deep slumber, and in a few moments the host and hostess are fast asleep. Then happens along Bridget's beau, the policeman, for whose particular benefit Bridget essays to go inside and procure a glass of "buttermilk." After imbibing, the policeman forgets all about everything except that he is wofully drowsy, and the next thing he, too, is asleep. It must have been contagious—or could Bridget not have forgotten herself?—but at any rate she, too wanders off into the Land of Nod. Then Sherlock dons the policeman's clothes and club and marches through the house, monarch of all he surveys.

At this opportune moment two burglars arrive on the scene, and seeing the sleepers, think they have been transferred to Burglars' Paradise. They sneak upstairs, fill their bags with silverware and then fall for the whiskey on the table, Little Sherlock watching eagerly. At last they get themselves off, followed by the creator of all the mischief, but they have not gone far when they are overcome by the liquor cure and fall in their tracks asleep. Little Sherlock now takes the manacles from the policeman's coat pocket and ties both legs of the burglars together. In due time the household awakes, they seek the boy, and eventually find him covering the two burglars, prisoners of Sherlock Holmes, Jr.

THE STEPDAUGHTER"

Yankee Release July 24th

In the majority of cases the lot of the stepdaughter is not an easy one, and the heroine of this story is no exception to the rule. Having lost her mother when hardly more than a baby, she was left to the care of her father, who, thinking that his infant daughter should have a mother's care married a widow with an only son.

Having, as he thought, provided his daughter with a mother's care, he dismissed the matter from his mind entirely. Unfortunately for the little motherless one, the woman whom her father married had no room in her heart for her husband's daughter, and the little one became the butt of her ill-temper. Neglected, abused and beaten, the little girl seeks solace in her poorly furnished room before the portrait of her sainted mother.

With tears streaming down her cheeks she prays for her mother's return or to take her to her heavenly home. In this pitiful attitude her father finds her and hears from her own lips the story of her miserable existence in her own home.

When confronted with the child's statements, the stepmother denies any cruelty, and excuses her treatment by pleading her desire to punish the child for her wilfulness. Having had his eyes opened, the father pays closer attention to his motherless baby, and discovers the truth at last. He orders the woman from his home and devotes himself to his daughter.

A childish brain, full of innocence and purity, can bear no ill will, and when the little girl hears from her stepbrother of his mother's illness and lonesomeness, she brings about a reconciliation and is amply rewarded by the gratitude and love of her hitherto cruel stepmother.

A KIND-HEARTED BROTHER.

Great Northern Release July 22d

A dramatic film of great power. A man loves his brother's wife, and is found one day by the husband making love to her. In great indignation the husband orders his unworthy brother out of the house. The latter goes, resolved to bring about the other's downfall in order to secure his ends. We are next given a glimpse of the private life of the wicked man, and see him in a secret chamber giving orders to his masked conspirators. After allowing due time to elapse, the villain schemes to again get the right of entrance to his brother's house. Adopting a guise which suggests that he has come down in the world, he gets in the way of his brother's motor car and is knocked down. The brother is greatly alarmed at the mishap, and takes him home. Here the crafty fellow simulates repentance for his former conduct, and is once more received into the house. His wicked schemes soon proceed to a consummation. His hirelings lie in wait for the unsuspecting husband, who is gagged and bound and taken to a dungeon. He succeeds, however, in making his escape, and emerges by way of a chimney on the housetops. He attracts the attention of policemen, who go in and arrest the plotters, and then accompany the husband poste haste to his house, where he arrives just in time to prevent further casualties.

"THE EXCHANGE"

Champion Release, July 25th

Since the coming of military pictures in film stories, there have been few to equal in intensity of heart interest and stirring heroic incident this martial presentation of THE EXCHANGE.

George Thomas and Walter Burnett are chums of the bivouac and campfire, and fate so ordains that they fall wounded on the same field of battle. Thus it is that we see them in the same hospital tent, convalescing, exhibiting for each other all the affection displayed by David and Jonathan of old. They have exchanged their life confidences again and again; and now a packet has come to George from the Uncle and Aunt whom he has not seen since childhood, with their protograph and a ring—a signet ring that has been an heirloom in the family.

George has recovered from his wound sufficiently to take his departure to the home of the dear friends who await his coming after all the long years of absence. He bids Walter an affectionate farewell, when suddenly the hospital camp is attacked and George falls stricken by the side of his friend. The attack is repulsed, but when the hospital surgeon responds to Walter's frantic cries, he shakes his head, and Walter mourns—for his faithful friend is apparently no more.

Left by the side of his dead friend an evil thought takes possession of him. In an instant he has appropriated the photos and letters which George has just received from the far away Southern home. He tries, too, to take the signet ring from his finger, but in this he fails, the surgeon and others coming in at the moment.

And so when Walter presents himself at the home of his friend he is received by them as their beloved relative, and Margery, the sweet-faced cousin to whom from childhood he was betrothed, accepts this turn of fate in the bliss of innocence. But George was not dead. Accidentally did they discover signs of life in the youth. But, alas! When he had fully recovered his robust health, his memory remained a blank. His identity was unknown to himself and in this peculiar state of mind he joined the Union Army.

Then the fortunes of war bring him to his old home, where Walter is enjoying his false position. The meeting is a great scene. The signet ring establishes George's identity, while Walter's consternation revealed his imposition. The happy ending may well be imagined rather than told.

"THE LINEMAN"

"Imp" Release July 27th

Mr. Carter is a commuter" living quite a distance from his office and communicates often with his wife by telephone. She is alone with her child and unprotected. The butler plans with a burglar to enter the house and rob the safe. She hears them at the door and is terrified. Her first impulse is to call her husband by telephone and she does so. He listens and advises her. She is frightened and obeys directions in regard to securing a revolver, but discovers that it is unloaded. The situation is a tense one, the apprehensive husband in his office powerless to lend assistance, and the wife at the mercy of the thieves, who try to batter down the door, and, becoming desperate, fire bullets through the keyhole.

The husband rushes from his office and charters a special engine to take him home.

A lineman is sent out to locate "trouble" on the telephone line. He leisurely climbs a pole and adjusts his instrument to listening. He is appalled at what he hears. A portion of the telephone conversation between Carter and his wife is overheard and the resourceful man on the pole acts. He hastily descends from his perch and, pressing an automobile into service, commands the driver to proceed with all possible haste to the Carter residence. In the meantime the husband is hurrying to the scene, the engine being driven to its limit.

The lineman and his party arrive on the scene just as the villainous butler and his accomplice burst in the door and seize the frightened wife. They are quickly overpowered and arrested by the rescuing party and the wife is overjoyed.

The husband arrives and his fears are allayed at finding his wife and child safe. He endeavors to reward the lineman, but the brave fellow will not take his money, making light of the affair, and saying he is only too glad to assist a woman and child in distress. The little girl takes in the situation and, going to the man wearing the climbers, she gives him her doll. The laborer is surprised, but he accepts the gift and they walk out into the street, where he takes her in his arms, making a pretty finale to the picture.

"SCIENCE"

"Imp" Release July 24th

Dr. Crawford and his wife, with their little daughter, Elsie, are at home amusing themselves with the Scotch collie puppy, Imp, when another doctor is announced, and he is shown an article in a newspaper which describes the providential rescue from drowning of the doctor's child by Lassie, the mother of Imp. Lassie comes in and is admired. Two more physicians arrive and announce that they have come to try an experiment with a newly discovered anesthetic.

Dr. Crawford has a guinea pig on which the experiment is to be tried, but it is discovered that the animal has died and the men of medicine are in a quandary. It is finally decided to use Imp, the puppy, for the experiment, against the mild protest of Elsie.

The puppy is placed on the operating table in the laboratory, with the mother dog in an adjoining room, apprehensive. She begs piteously for them to release her offspring. The puppy dies under the experiment, and Lassie is admitted to the laboratory. The mother wails dolefully. Elsie comes on the scene and her grief over the loss of the puppy is inconsolable. The doctors are saddened, Dr. Crawford and his wife endeavoring to comfort the child.

The gardener digs a grave and the sorrowing procession goes out to bury the dog. Lassie sees the grave dug, follows the gardener about in a way that is almost human. He goes to the laboratory and then to the garden. She sees the clods placed over the body of her puppy and returns with the saddened physicians and the inconsolable child, and then trots sorrowfully to the grave and, approaching it mournfully, places her paws on it in an attitude of prayer—alone with her dead—her grief being pitiful to witness.

"WON BY A FOOT"

"Imp" Release July 24th

A novelty picture of "quarter length" figures, only portion of the lower extremities being shown until the finale.

Woman with attractive looking hosiery, boots and lingerie is followed by a man whose shoes and hose show refinement.

There is a short walk and a tramp's feet are shown on a bench. Tramp is discovered by a policeman and is given the "hot foot" treatment and runs bumping into the woman. He is slugged by the gallant and then chased by a policeman. Tramp runs up an alley, followed by the guardian of the public safety. The copper evidently tires of the chase and seeks a saloon to quench his thirst.

The woman seats herself on a park bench and admires the scenery. She is joined by the masher, who seats himself beside her. The man edges over towards her and she naively moves away. This is followed by a gradual understanding and the couple move toward one another, being mutually attracted.

There is a season of foot flirtation which is ludicrous in the extreme. It is a new language, but is perfectly understandable, and speaks volumes, without improper suggestion. Hunger is depicted by the foot signs, and the couple arise, two souls with a single thought (or foot), and they move away, evidently favorably impressed with each other.

The scene reverts to a restaurant, where the obsequious waiter is shown catering to their wants, and hunger is apparently appeased, if the foot movements are any criterion by which to judge. At a stage in the luncheon, by clever manipulation of the camera, the full length figures of the diners are shown, and there is something of a surprise in store for the audience.

The principal figures in the little comedy of feet prove to be an eccentric old man and a typical, gushing old maid. They are happy at the result of the mild flirtation and the effect is very funny.

WIN A PRIZE.

We wish to call your attention to an advertisement appearing in this issue of a prize contest offered by a film manufacturer having the facilities of turning out two high class productions, one popular drama and one novelty or educational film weekly.

Many good suggestions have been received, and as this contest does not close until September 1st, why not try to win one of the prizes offered and send in a happy thought or inspiration that may come to you.

Such plays as "Imp," "Photoplay" and many others that could be named were the results of prize contests.

The famous and popular Imp dog "Lassie" will make a tremendous hit with your patrons by her almost human acting in the Imp release of Monday, July 24th. It is called and is one of the strongest arguments ever put forth on the subject of vivisection. It is pathetic to a high degree, and, as an old showman says, "tears coin as much money as laughter for the showman." Tell your exchange you want "Science" for an early booking. On the same reel you'll get "Won by a Foot," a short bit of ridiculous and unique comedy that will fool you all until the very last few feet have been "run off." Then on Thursday, July 27th, we release a melodrama called and, believe us, it is a "meller drammer" that will hit the bull's-eye plump in the center. It will give you all the excitement you want on one reel of film. The situations are so tense and the climax so dramatic that the best description ever written wouldn't do justice to it. Get this film or know the reason why!

"Science"

NEWSY ITEMS FROM EL CAJON VALLEY

Mr. Jack Richardson, one of the character men in our Western Company, is usually delegated to the dare-devil reckless feats made necessary in stories being produced, and which the balance of the company intimate an unwillingness to handle on account of the risk of life and limb incident to the action required.

In film entitled "The Ranchman's Nerve," described in this issue of "Film Facts," Mr. Richardson is cast in the character of the "desperado," feared and abhorred by the cowmen residing near the headquarters of his depredations. The film depicts him in a fearsome light.

In the film Richardson, in the character of the "Desperado," is shot. The shooting takes place from a distance and Mr. Richardson was supposed to fall as he is standing on the apex of an abutment of rock pushing itself out from a cliff fully sixty feet high at this particular place. After being shot, in accordance with the story and falling, Mr. Richardson missed his footing. The camera man was on the job and, while poor Richardson hurtled through the air in his appalling drop apparently to his death, the camera followed him. Mr. Richardson suffered a fracture of his right ankle and broke his right collar bone. He is still "hors-de-combat," but upon being informed, when he regained consciousness, that the camera man had immortalized his accidental drop in film entitled "The Ranchman's Nerve," he said that he was satisfied; that the "cause," in other words, was worthy of the "effect." This fall is the climax to one of the best Flying A Dramatic films made by this company and the exhibitors will do well to arrange for an advance booking.

Mr. Allan Dwan, the producer in charge of our Western aggregation, has long had in mind the great dramatic worth of an incident depicting the rescue of a cowboy who has just been lynched through the medium of the shooting ability of the cowboy's sweetheart. The situation was a difficult one to produce if he desired to maintain and hold inviolate his reputation for realism. In film entitled "The Outlaw's Trail," described in this issue of "Film Facts." Mr. Dwan has satisfactorily realized his anticipations.

Mr. Warren Kerrigan, who, in this particular film is cast in the part of the sheriff, after being pursued by the outlaw band and roped from off his horse by one of the outlaws, is strung up without much ado to a near-by tree. His sweetheart in the story (Miss Pauline Bush) has been following the sheriff's posse, her intention being to rescue her lover from the hands of the enraged outlaws. Rounding a turn in the trail, high up along the side of the mountain, she sees Mr. Kerrigan hanging limp and apparently dead along the side of the trail. Appreciating from the action of the outlaws, who are just departing from the scene, that she cannot hope to save her lover no matter how fast she and the sheriff's posse may ride, she pulls her rifle from its scabbard, and taking careful aim at the rope above Mr. Kerrigan's head, fires. The rope is cut by the bullet and Mr. Kerrigan drops just in time to save his life.

Miss Bush is a good shot, but cutting a rope with a Winchester rifle at five hundred yards is a little bit beyond her power. We therefore arranged the scene in such wise that one Mr. Morrison, a crack shot, and belonging to our Western Company, was hidden in the underbrush within twenty-five feet of the spot where Mr. Kerrigan was lynched. He was instructed to watch for the flash of Miss Bush's rifle and simultaneously use his best endeavors with a view to cutting the rope with a bullet from his 48-caliber revolver. The scene had to be taken over three times as Mr. Morrison's aim at the start was faulty. The fourth scene, however, as depicted in the above picture, will undoubtedly be acknowledged and acclaimed by the exhibitors throughout the United States as being one of the most realistic and most thrilling rescues ever enacted on the picture screen.

Minneapolis, Minn.—E. M. Foster, 2936 Lyndale Avenue, will erect a moving picture theater to cost $2,500.

Crockett, Tex.—McLean & Arledge are building an air-dome theater on Main Street.

Amboy, Ill.—Ralph Dixon, of Dixon, has rented a room in the Hegert Building and will operate a moving picture show to be known as the Majestic Theater.

Fargo, N. Dak.—Emerson & Son expect to erect an opera house at Minot.

Chillicothe, Ohio.—E. W. Pfeiffer has been awarded the contract for the erection of the new $20,000 theater.

San Antonio, Tex.—The Ruby Theater was destroyed by fire.

Handbook for Motion Picture and Stereoptican Operators

OUR FRONT COVER ILLUSTRATION

We are pleased to present to our readers this week on our front cover a scene from one of the Solax Military releases, entitled "An Enlisted Man's Honor," which they will release on August 11th.

EDUCATION IN FILMS

From all parts of the country we are receving requests for lists of educational films, and asking what subjects are already on the market, where they could be obtained, and offering suggestions for others.

The Imp Company with their vivisection picture is starting on the right lines. If it is only possible to show up the horrors and the unnecessary cruelties caused by the so-called science of vivisection, it may be the country will be roused to petition that such cruelties in the name of science shall cease. Another educational picture that might be gotten up would be one depicting the horrors of vaccination. We well remember when we were in Paris we saw strapped on the operating table calves which were all blistered up to give the virus and lymph to inoculate innocent victims of a filthy rite. We saw many results causing permanent injury to those vaccinated. We have seen many deaths from vaccination, and if some of the scenes could only be placed upon a film we feel sure it would be one of the finest educational propaganda films that could be shown to the people of Nickelodia.

The inoculation for tuberculosis, and such like diseases, might be shown in all their horrors and then as a reverse to the picture, it might be well to show what sanitation, personal cleanliness, and the education of the people have done to eliminate smallpox and such virulent diseases from our population. Educational pictures on temperance lines, the showing of states where no saloon is and the condition of those where saloons are rampant. Agriculture and farming are being taken up in a small degree, but they might be more largely filmed. The raising of chickens, showing the various processes of the life of a chicken, from its incubator, or from the sitting of a mother hen, would be very interesting to all poultry farmers.

We are informed also that there is a league being formed in New York and New Jersey with a $100,000 capital to fight against the bread trust and show conditions under which the bread trust is trying to eliminate the independent bakers. These films, we understand, are to show the abstract slavery under which the bakery workers are subjected.. The milk farms and various food supply manufactories have already filmed some of their industries. It might be advisable to get films to spread the cause of vegetarianism, showing how food could be produced without animal product, such as the great center at Battle Creek, the Quaker oats, and such like industries. All these would educate the people up to a true knowledge of health, sanitation and hygiene, and if some enterprising manufacturers working with the co-operation of these industries would use the cinematograph, we feel sure much good would result. Of course, it needs money, it needs brains, it needs time and patience. At the same time we believe that the cost will be more than covered by the great good the community would receive through the various societies and associations who would buy them.

FROM THE DAGUERREOTYPE TO THE CINEMATOGRAPH

The length of time that has taken place between these two industries seems a long stretch, but there has just deceased in New York City a man, whom we honored as one of our best friends, who could stretch these two limits. In our younger days we dabbled with the daguerreotype which was then almost out of existence, although we had many to clean and repair in our young apprenticeship to the art. Our next step was the wet collodion process which to-day for some industries is beyond compare. Next on the scene came the crude attempt of dry plate photography. First by dry collodion, then gelatine emulsion, until to-day the dry plate manufacturer stands almost supreme in the production of the rapidity of plates by which a photograph can be taken in the extreme fraction of a second, as some of the focal pane shutters seem to give, of 1500th of a second. In conjunction with this there comes along the cinematograph, and we are apt to question where will it all end, and what shall we discover in the immediate future by the aid of photography.

All the above was called forth on learning of the decease of George Gardner Rockwood, who died at his home, Lakewood, N. J., on July the 10th.

It was our pleasure to meet the late Mr. Rockwood some twenty years ago when he visited England, and on our coming to America we personally renewed our friendship which lasted until the day of his death. George Gardner Rockwood was a marvel in his day. He was the pioneer of the photographic art, and in the eighty years of his life he has had one of the most wonderful careers in photography it is possible to conceive. Among the sitters have been such famous men as Horace Greeley, practically all the Presidents of the United States, commencing with Martin Van Buren, Hayes, down to former President Roosevelt. We saw in his studio photographs of Gen. Scott, N. P. Wilis, Gen. Anderson, Ole Bull, and thousands of prominent actors and actresses from all over the world, and his collection of daguerreotypes often made our mouth water. We begged a few of him and they are amongst our most cherished souvenirs. Oftentimes we discussed with him the beauties of photography and the vast educational possibilities of cinematography. He said to us on our last conversation, "Saunders, I wish I was twenty years younger and I would then produce the finest series of educational, historical and national interest films that ever could be conceived. He often spoke to us of some of the mediocre pictures that were being exhibited by the manufacturers, and making comparison to what they might have been.

Some two years ago we visited with him a theater and his criticisms on some of the photography and the plots were more forcible than polite. He had promised to give us his ideas and criticisms upon the visit we made. Owing to his duties and the sickness with which he was attacked, we did not wish to burden him, and in the passing away of George Gardner Rockwood we personally have lost a good friend, photography has lost its pioneer, but the world is better for having such a man as George Gardner Rockwood numbered amongst its denizens.

THE N. E. A. AND MOVING PICTURES

Editor, Moving Picture News,

Dear Sir:—Horoscopically speaking, you have "been and gone and done it again." Did you not once write that the (M. P.) "industry is on the threshold of advancement," and that it will "advance by leaps and bounds?" I quote from memory only, but I'm willing to wager that you really DID say it.

Well, we are having one of the "leaps" out here in the Golden West just now. The bay cities of San Francisco, Oakland and Berkeley are besieged by the forces of the N. E. A., and a more cultured and happy set of pedagogues and schoolma'ams it would be hard to find the world over.

The heralding of this intellectual invasion of the wild and woolly west may have passed unnoticed by the picture men in general, but those who have the educational movement at heart were rejoiced to find that Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, the veteran president of the teachers, gave three lectures in the California University Theater on "Child Welfare" and kindred topics, and that these lectures were illustrated by "Official Motion Pictures" taken throughout the country and depicting the different local environments of young America.

The Moving Picture News is not quite the medium to discuss Mrs. Young's program, but from both educational and entertainment standpoints it is worthy of all praise.

The point for you is that official recognition of the cinematograph as an educative factor has been given by the most weighty body of educators in the land. Well, didn't you say so?

That is, however, but the beginning. I have had some very interesting interviews with the teachers from every part of the states, and though their official convention program is crowded to the limit with agenda, I have yet to find one single delegate who is not ready at any moment to talk EDUCATIONAL FILMS.

I was surprised to find that many of the teachers had read recent issues of the Moving Picture News, or at least they were able to speak intelligently of your Miss MacDonald's articles and the stand you had taken on educational matters. They realized, too, that the Trust had persistently kept the public in darkness as to the possibility of using cineograms in educational work except at great expense, until they (the teachers) began to correspond on the subject with their European friends. The sentiment that is most plainly evident among the teachers at the convention relative to educational motography is one of uncompromising hostility towards the picture Trusts, by whatever names they have been, are, or may be known.

I am but an outsider, yet I venture to say you will hear from some of these educationalists within the near future.

In writing some opinions for your paper, I may have acquired something of the gift of prophecy, and I see in the horoscope that the teacher will be a dominant factor in the future of the motion picture business.

O, let it be soon!

Yours truly,
LINDSAY BANCROFT.

San Francisco, July 11th.

THE ESKIMO AS A SUBJECT FOR MOVING PICTURES

By Margaret I. MacDonald

As a subject for a moving picture there is no race on the face of the earth more interesting than the Eskimo. In his habits and mode of living he is totally different from almost any other of the earth's tribes. Strange to say, he has a particular dislike to being photographed. However, having learned the white man's feeling of curiosity toward his race, he is willing to stand before the camera, providing he is paid well for it.

It is most interesting to learn how these people have lived for centuries, and also to note the progress some of them have made toward reforming their habits, and conforming somewhat to the white man's mode of living. A history of these people might be given in moving pictures, from the time when they followed the rivers of the central and upper portion of North America and Europe, catching fish and hunting game, showing how they were driven farther and farther northward until they became an isolated tribe on the shores of the Arctic Ocean. From this point then would follow the forming of the habits and customs with which we found them—the striving to keep warm by covering their bodies with skins, and the rubbing in of the seal oil to their bodies so that the cold would not penetrate through the pores of the skin. Very interesting would be the preparation of the dugouts in the ground, under the snow which serve as houses, and are called igloos. Then would come the appearance on the scene of the white man, and the attitude of the Eskimo toward the white man which is, by the way, very kindly, for many a white brother has the Eskimo saved from death in the frozen northern regions. The catching of the walrus has already been given us in moving picture films, and makes a wonderful and interesting picture, and one which was obtained with very great difficulty on account of the necessity of taking the picture machine on a cake of ice out in the middle of the ocean in order to follow up the hunt. Then there is their wonderful aptitude at carving on ivory, which ivory is obtained from the walrus tusks, and which when carved they sell for large sums of money to the white man. And most interesting of all would be the Eskimo school at Cape Prince of Wales, where the Eskimo boys and girls are taught to read and write in our language. I have in my possession a couple of letters written to me by Eskimo boys, and very proud they were of the accomplishment. The following is a copy of one of the letters I received, which may be interesting to my readers not only as a sample of their handling of the English language, but of the kindly, gentle spirit exhibited in almost every instance in the Eskimo.

Wales, Alaska, March 1, 1910.

Dear Friend M. I. MacDonald.

Your letter received last two (2) weeks ago. I was very glad to hear from you, and so was my friends. Forwarded your letter to read from Reindeer herd.

I just came down from the herd to see my parent. I found them well and we do all well.

The Cape people are many caught seal and big seal. Well, I am going to reply your a letter.

I was so glad when I reach that your nice picture and some books.

I'll be glad when you come again, except George Ootema he saying any more stay in The Biatuk next summer. I guess we'll stay up there in next summer on the Mint River, can you know that place? I'll not forget you and I'll write sometimes too and you write to me.

We are having really cold here now, and last one months ago very snowing and wind blow from the North.

As I have not much more time in my writing close.

Good-bye,

Yours very truly, GRANT WEMARK.

The Eskimo village at Nome where they have been taught to do all kinds of work as the white man does it, gardening, sewing, cooking, etc, is very interesting. Mrs. Layfeldt who on her own accord and by her own personal expenditure has done much for the cause of the Eskimo race, is deserving of a great deal of credit. I am sorry to have to say that the white man is the cause of all the Eskimo's trouble in the way of demoralization. Many of the Eskimos are practically dying with diseases of different kinds which have come to them through contact with demoralized white men in the shape of traders, whalers and such. All of this would prove very interesting and instructive placed before the public on the moving picture film, and would be productive of an interest in our brothers of the Far North who are so anxious to know and do the best that the white man has to teach him.

GLEANINGS FROM A CONVERSATION WITH MR. WILLIAM J. GANE, OF THE MANHATTAN THEATER

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

Last week when New York's dumb animals as well as the human portion of its population were sweltering in the heat William J. Gane, of the Manhattan Theater, gave water to a thirsty horse in front of his theater on the corner of Broadway and 31st street. While the horse drank he took the hose and sprinkled it with the fresh, cool water; for his pains he was fined ten dollars. However, Mr. Gane, seeing the comfort the horse derived from its shower bath, in the kindness of his heart, immediately installed a couple of real shower baths at the edge of the pavement directly in front of the Manhattan, and here hundreds of our dumb friends reveled, during the recent hot wave, in the refreshing spray so thoughtfully provided for them by the big-hearted manager.

WM. J. GANE

Mr. Gane has climbed the ladder of success, step by step at first, and then in big jumps. Starting life as a water boy in a Philadelphia theater, he has been all along the line through the ups and downs of theatrical life to the point which he reached some few years ago of theatrical manager. He has acted in the capacity of treasurer at the American, and again at the Hippodrome before becoming absorbed in his own extensive theatrical interests.

In conversation with Mr. Gane the other day with regard to the moving picture business, the demand for educational films, etc., he expressed himself in the following manner: "The moving picture business has advanced very rapidly. It used to be that people were almost ashamed to be seen at a moving picture show—it isn't that way any more. But the producers have got to look out or the interest of the public is going to die down—even now we have to resort to all kinds of crazy things to attract them—something different every day." "What do you figure is the cause of the lapse of interest?" I asked. "Why they get tired of looking at the same old thing. The public is getting educated to pictures."

"What about the educational film?"

"Why, that's what we want," said he.

"Then you think the public will stand for them?"

"Sure they will—they like them. People are sick of the stuff they've been giving us. Why, we've had Indians, Wild West, cowboy pictures, murders, low comedy until people are sick of it. Who wants to see a man fall over a milk bottle?—too much forced comedy."

"What kind of educational films do the public like best?" I asked.

"They like scenic pictures—pictures of foreign lands—in fact, they like anything now in the way of an educational film. Now here's what I would do—I'd go over to Philadelphia and I'd get some pictures of Girard College, showing just how they train the boys there and all about it; I'd take other colleges all over the country, too. I would get a picture of where the Declaration of Independence was signed. I would go to all the big cities of our own land and I would take all the principal places and things of interest—the principal streets, the parks and so on. Why there's Chicago, Detroit, San Francisco, Los Angeles, cities that people like to see—there are thousands of people in New York and passing through from these places that would like to see scenes from their own towns."

"Yes, indeed, that's all good," I commented.

"Now here's another interesting thing—let them go out here to Jersey and photograph the cranberry in its development. It takes five years for the cranberry bush to come to maturity, and pictures showing all along the line of its development would be very interesting. Anything of that kind is good."

"I'm very glad to hear you express yourself in that manner," I remarked.

"Well, it's a fact—producers have got to wake up—this moving picture business is going to advance—it's bound to advance. If they would get out even one release a week of that kind they'd be doing something. Then another thing—if they would pay big money and get some one like Nat Goodwin, or Francis Wilson, or any of the big stars to work for them, and then we could advertise, say, Nat Goodwin, in a sketch, or somebody else in a sketch. Why, we could pack the house, and it would do away with a lot of these small acts."

"Then do you figure that if such a thing could be worked the vaudeville part of the performance could be dispensed with altogether?"

"I don't know but what it might."

Mr. Gane is very strong in his belief that the future of the moving picture rests with the producer, and strong in his faith in a rapid enlightenment and appreciation in the public mind.

It is good to meet a man like Mr. Gane—it sort of stirs up your own lagging faith in the gradual betterment of the human race—it makes you feel that if there is one manager of such a mind and disposition toward better things in this great city there must be more. The feeling and thought of such a man of such strong convictions must reach out and around. On the desire of men to support the best motives in life rests the moral and mental welfare of the race.

RECORDS FOR POSTERITY

(Editorial in New York Times, July 13.)

We have received from Mr. Alexander Konta a letter proposing the foundation in New York of the first municipal Modern Historic Records Association. Mr. Konta's proposal is remarkable in that it would include for the first time provision, not only for the preservation of written records, but of the means of seeing and hearing historical personages for the benefit of future generations.

By means of the kinetoscope and the phonograph, had they been invented in his time, we might now see Bismarck, that intellectual and physical giant of abounding energy, and hear his thin, piping voice as he uttered the words that shaped the destinies of European Governments. Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg would be delivered by himself before countless thousands of the children of to-day, and those yet unborn. Thus the majestic figures of prophets and poets may in future rise from the oblivion of printed documents into the visual and auditory world.

But Mr. Konta's plan is more comprehensive than this. There has never been an association formed to systematize the gathering and preservation of contemporary records for posterity. The Times has shown how the most precious historical documents of this nation are housed in buildings at Washington subjected to the mercies of the casual cigarette and the flung-away sulphur match. Our newspapers are not capable of preservation through the centuries like the rolls of Egyptian papyrus; of them special and less perishable imprints should be preserved. The best photographs of the past generation may not be found in the original plates; Mr. Konta would gather the photographic plates which should be preserved as records.

We have methods of fireproofing such as have never been equalled. We have inventions that catch, retain, and reproduce vividly the very lineaments and voices of our times. We can transfer our written records to imperishable fabrics. It is in the ripeness of time, as Mr. Konta says, that we may now provide "a systematic extension of the historic records which the present may bequeath to posterity."

Elks' Convention at Atlantic City

The Imp Company scored a beat over its competitors in filming the National Convention of the Elks at Atlantic City. The camera men secured approximately 700 feet of scenes of the big meeting, including the big pageant in which the Elks participated in a parade which was one of the largest ever held by this popular order. The photography is excellent and the sites for the taking most excellently chosen. It is a grand, glittering spectacle of the annual outing of the "Best People On Earth," and the film will prove interesting in every city, village and hamlet in America. The Imp Company will make it a special release, the date having not been decided upon.

THE HAPPY THEME'S THE THING

That film producers, leastwise American ones, are rapidly enlightening themselves to the superiority of the happy over the sombre picture themes, is evidenced every time one reads a film synopsis. The tawdry and too-heavy film plot is persona non grata at most studios to-day, and it seems that the best producers are really going out of their way to turn out work that is free from the disagreeable. A good instance is furnished in the film-story of "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," released by Thanhouser, Tuesday, August 1st, where the producer had a quantity of versions to select from, none of them very pretty in their finish. This was due to the ripe age of each, their common source being a legend centuries old, which wound up as old legends will, with a heavy, horrible "lesson" by way of moral.

By walking away with a small army of children, a certain man—the Pied Piper, in fact—was to make their dishonest parents feel real bad. But modern ingenuity and modern plain common sense changed all that. The film producer had to send the Hamelin tots away after the Piper, to conform with the main thread of the legend—but he showed that the Piper was a human being with some very human emotions, and that a plea put to him by the right party in the right way got the right result. As the right result meant the restoration of the children to their parents, it was the logical ending for the film, and Thanhouser is to be commended for having it that way.

J. I. W., Denver, Colo., writes: I am a pianist in one of the theaters here, and must tell you I have found your hints very valuable to me in my work. I wish you would suggest some music to be used in "Western and Cowboy Pictures." I have been using "Idaho," etc., so long.

Answer.—I am very glad you are pleased with our endeavors, and also glad to note they have helped you. I am mailing you a list of music you can use with "Western" pictures, and trust they will meet your requirements.

A. N. D., Roswell, N. M., writes: Please send me the address of some music dealer or publisher of whom I can obtain some good "cue" music.

Answer.—Write to Carl Fischer, 6-10 Fourth Ave., New York City; he has some excellent music for "cues," etc.

H. L. C., Kansas City, Mo., writes: Our operator has a mania for seeing just how fast he can run the pictures, that it makes it nearly impossible for me to play for the pictures in the proper manner—please tell me what I should do under conditions like this.

Answer.—If the manager does not care enough about his show to have the pictures in the proper manner, I would not bother myself very much about appropriate music. I am, indeed, sorry for you.

"What am I going to do to make you love me," from "The Jolly Bachelors."

"You are the Ideal of my dreams," "All that I ask is love," "Some of these days," "Meet me to-night in dreamland," "Lonesome," "Let me call you sweetheart," "If I had a thousand lives to live."

If you will only stop and consider for a moment how many people come into the theater to hear the music as well as to see the pictures, you will see how very important it is to look after this portion of the theater just the same as you do your pictures. Advertise the music, as well as the pictures—if you have a picture that should not be run or is not fit to be shown, you do not show it—but if you have an extra good one you spend (or should if you want to get the desired results) a little money for printers' ink. Let it be the same with your music—if the musicians are a credit to the theater, advertise the fact. It will help both the theater in its receipts and the musician will take more interest in his work. And on the other hand, if the musician is in the class with the poor pictures, do just as you would with poor film service, etc. Get one that isn't. Remember, it is in the picture business as well as any other, that "The early bird gets the worm," and always make it a point to see that you are not the worm.

Advertising is the life of business, if the proper sort is used. When advertising hurts your business, quit your business. An ad. at times in your local newspaper will stimulate your musicians to renewed efforts—the following is only intended as an idea or suggestion:

The above ad. would infer that an orchestra was being used, and while the subject of an orchestra is here allow me to go more into the subject of orchestra music for the pictures.

Pictures can be played just as successfully with an orchestra as they can with a pianist alone.

The first step toward securing a first-class orchestra is secure the services of a competent leader, and then allow him to secure his own musicians, if he is capable of leading the orchestra, he is also capable of selecting his own musicians. The leader is the one who gets all of the blame if the music is not rendered as it should be, so he should be allowed to select his own musicians.

During the past few years greta strides have been made in the production of moving pictures—in the beginning the public were forced to see and listen to any and everything, but it has advanced to that stage of the game when nothing is too good for the pleasure-seeking public—if they are unable to see the class of pictures, and hear the kind of music they desire in one theater, they will go where they can. The public have been educated to and see and hear the best, and now they demand it.

There is absolutely no reason why an orchestra cannot always have new selections—the leader in the first place should have a library full of all of the standard selections, and then by joining the numerous "clubs" over the country he will be able to obtain all of the "popular" music he needs, and this music in connection with the cue music issued by different publishers, will or should enable him to at all times properly play for any and all pictures, if he uses proper judgment in the selection of his musical program.

The average musician is under the impression that it is necessary for them to change the music with each scene as it occurs in the picture—but this idea is entirely wrong; it would do more harm than good, for it would be a very difficult proposition to so arrange your music and have enough of it out for all of your program to allow this to be done. Good judgment must be used in dividing the picture so as to pick out the important situations and to select the main theme of the subject to be played for—you must make it a point to try and play the pictures just as smooth as you can, and try and avoid that undesirable break, that so often is heard, and that is entirely uncalled for. The average audience appreciates good music, and you will soon realize that it cannot be produced by trying to follow each and every scene and insert music to fit the individual scene as it appears. Four out of each five of the patrons of a theater come for the music; make your music appeal to the public in general and you will soon find out that it pays.

In playing for the heavier class of pictures such as "The Fall of Troy," etc., you have an excellent chance to play your heavy music, such as "Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2," "Peer Gynt," "La Traviata," etc., as the pictures of this class usually run along the same line, and it is hardly advisable to try to follow each and every scene in them. There are usually in numbers such as I have mentioned above any number of different tempos, and they can be made to fit into the picture splendidly. Pictures such as the "Fall of Troy" have required much labor and expenditure of a great amount of money to produce them and they are certainly entitled to the best music to be had.

A. C. M., Taylorsville, Ill., writes: Will you kindly forward me a list, or suggest the same, through your columns, of popular songs I can use in playing for dramatic pictures? I have been reading your advice on the proper sort of music, etc., for a picture theater, and for one want to thank you for the good advice you have given. Your numbers so far are the best I have read on the subject, let the good work go on.

Answer.—Your letter is, indeed, an inspiration to better things. We are very much pleased to note that you are pleased with our columns, and hope you will make use of them as often as needed. The list if printed would require more space than we are allowed, but I offer the following list and will forward you one by mail in the near future. All of the following are suitable:

"You Must Be Mine, Dear," from "The Girl in the Train"; "The Girl of My Dreams," from the opera of the same name; "Let's Pretend You Love Me," from "The Goddess of Liberty"; "I'll Be Your Honey When It's Moonlight," from "Miss Nobody from Starland."

SOLAX COMPANY

Madame Alice Blaché

In spite of the terribly hot weather Mme. Blaché, president of the Solax Co., went with her company to Fort Meyer to be on the spot in case of emergency and assure success for the big series of military pictures. When our reporter found her at her desk on her return the other day in a cool summer dress, nothing but a coat of tan was left to indicate the strenuous three weeks of hard work in a torrid heat this remarkable woman had gone through. She spoke enthusiastically of the kindness and courtesy of all the officers and men of the 15th Cavalry and urged us to publish her very kindest and best thanks to them all—she says she will always treasure the pleasant thoughts of her visit to Washington among her kindest of remembrances. Words which we know are sincere and which easily indicate the kind gentleness of her nature.

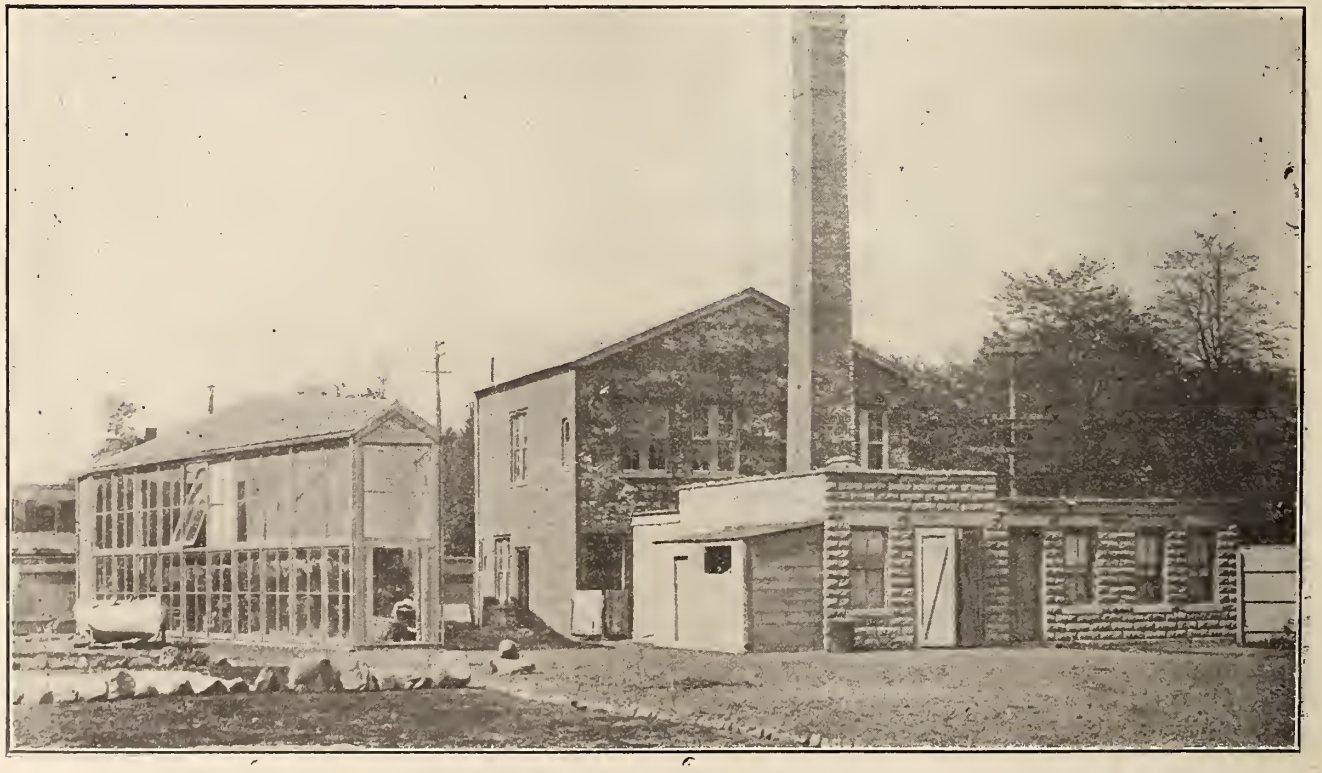
Never before in the history of moving picture making has a government contributed for the use of a moving picture manufacturer the flower of its army. This has been brought about for the first time by the Solax Company through the influence of its managing director, Mr. Wilbert Melville, and the courtesy and co-operation of Colonel Joseph Gerrard commanding the 15th Calvary.

The equestrian work of the 15th Calvary, Uncle Sam's crack regiment, is something marvelous, while the willingness and zeal with which the different troops entered into the spirit of the various dramatic photo plays staged by Mr. Melville has resulted in the production of some of the most elaborate, thrilling and interesting military dramas ever thrown upon a screen.

"The Mascot of Troop C," "An Enlisted Man's Honor," "The Stampede" and other photo plays made at Fort Meyer not only thrill with dramatic activity, but afford opportunities for horsemanship and military exactitude never before witnessed in moving pictures.

The beautiful scenic bits available around Washington have been taken advantage of to the fullest possible extent and lend every aid to the completion of what are undoubtedly almost perfect portrayals.

During the stay of the Solax Company at Washington, Mr. Melville was ably assisted by Captain Warren Dean, commanding Troop "C," who possesses natural histrionic ability of a high order. Captain Dean entered enthusiastically into the work at hand and in fact two of the scenarios produced were written by him.



"WHERE THE SOLAX

Those Fifteenth United States Cavalry Pictures Taken at the Government Military Post, Fort Meyer, Virginia

This series of pictures stand unique in full massiveness and strength and as boosters for business during the depression customarily felt in hot weather they will undoubtedly be welcomed with joy by the exchange and as a means of putting many extra dollars in the pockets of exhibitors wise enough to demand them.

Pages 10 and 11 give an idea of what this strenuous director of the Solax Co. has been doing. He jumped in his automobile with his stock company under his arm, so to speak, drove from New York to Washington, spent twelve hours a day in the sun during the worst heat wave in years and made the big scoop in military pictures. Mr. Melville says these pictures are so exciting they should be printed on non-inflammable film.

Herbert Blache Sails for Europe

Mr. Herbert Blanché, president of the Gaumont Co., of New York, accompanied by his wife, Mrs. Alice Blache, president of the Solax Co., will sail on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, July 26th, for a two months' trip through European countries combining business with pleasure. They look forward to meeting their many friends in all the big European cities, where they are both well known.

PICTURES ARE MADE"

By G. F. Blaisdell

On Monday the writer had the pleasure of seeing two notable films—an Independent and a licensed. The first was Imp's "Class Reunion." It was a story of a dinner of seven survivors—of whom six had been fortunate in their life work; the seventh had come to the end of his resources, and in his declining years was penniless and without prospects. The dinner was a jolly affair, the six prosperous ones ignoring the garb of the less fortunate professor—a dress suit which had seen better days and an improvised shirt bosom which revealed on each side the unstarched garment underneath. During the course of the dinner the classmate to the left of the professor passed around for the admiration of his fellows a case containing a wonderful ruby. As the professor in due course returned the jewel to its more or less hilarious and at the moment unobserving owner the stone slipped from the case into a glass of wine. A moment later the owner discovered the absence of the ruby. Consternation followed. The professor, known to have been the last to handle it, alone refused to submit to search, and retired from the dinner. One of the party followed him home and saw him, through the window, abstracting from his pockets napkins containing the delicacies he had failed to eat and had surreptitiously concealed that the partner of his joys and sorrows might share with him his dinner. The observer sadly retired to inform his classmates of what he had seen. During his absence the owner of the jewel, in drinking his wine, had found that which was lost. While the party was considering how best to make amends to the professor the observer returned and told his story. Immediately packages of food were made up and the entire party set out for the house of the professor. The members of the party deposited on the table the good things they had brought, and the owner of the jewel, mounting a chair, presented the professor, as a mark of the love and respect of the members of the class, the jewel which had been the cause of the misunderstanding. It was a heart-stirring climax, a fitting conclusion to a well wrought and splendidly acted drama.

The second film was Edison's, "Marvels of Horsemanship." It was well named. The picture showed the rough riding abilities of the Fifteenth Cavalry at Fort Myer. It showed also that for skill in horsemanship, in fancy riding, and in dare-devil work, the men in the United States cavalry are second to none in the world. One of the features that caught a large audience at Keith's, Broadway and Fourteenth Street, was the hurdle jumping of three horses driven by one man, standing. All the horses in one troop were engaged in this particular exhibition, and they were driven at top speed and in close order. At the conclusion of the 1,000 feet of film there was hearty applause—a rare thing in any theater and especially so in an audience such as gathers in this house.

Film Facts, the medium of the American for the announcement of forthcoming releases, is a model publication. No. 6, Volume 2, which describes the product of Flying A from July 24 to August 3, is of particular interest. The photographs are good; the small engravings which decorate the pages and which picture phases of Far Western life are the work of an artist. The two pages of "Newsy Items from El Cajon Valley" are worthy of publication in a high-class magazine.

Superintendent A. B. Busey of the Colorado State Insane Asylum, is arranging for weekly moving picture exhibitions for the entertainment of the 1,200 inmates of his institution.

The action of the Very Rev. John C. York in rising from his seat in the Bijou Theater, in Huntington, L. I., to denounce the picture of "The Nun" was characteristic of the man. If he has ever been known to dodge the spotlight at any time the fact has not come to the notice of this writer. The subject matter, of course, was not pleasing to the priest. It is a question, though, had the picture been a portrayal of "The Scarlet Letter," if Father York would have felt called upon publicly and in a theater at which he was a mere spectator, to denounce the representation. Certainly his action was tantamount to a breach of the peace, or might easily have become so. Among exhibitors and the public generally there will be some sympathy with Mr. Rinas, the exhibitor who said: "I leased the film after it was passed on by the National Censorship Board, which censors all pictures. I think, however, Dean York had no more right to make a public speech in my theater than I would have to do the same thing in his church. If he had a criticism to make he should have come to me privately."

The Rev. Dr. H. M. Wharton, of the Brantley Baptist Church, of Baltimore, has been discussing picture shows. The doctor is thoroughly human in his opinions and disavows the suggestion that he is opposed to moving pictures. He deplores, however, the effect on the minds of the young of the more sensational plays. Moralists not necessarily stern will agree that there is much truth in the semi-humorous talk of Dr. Wharton, who said, among other things:

"Any little moving picture show that is a good little show is the right little show for me. I think that while the picture parlors can do a great deal of good they can certainly do a great deal of harm. They attract all classes, both young and old. Now, it is a well-known fact," continued the doctor, with a smile, "that somehow a shady place with only dim light brings out the soft and endearing traits. It is strange, but love thrives best under the moon.

"When under the mellow light of the semi-darkness of these picture parlors a young man sees a young lady, and they both look at a melo-dramatic love scene; what is the result? Do they go out and bid each other a frigid goodbye? Well not exactly.

"A chaperon would prevent all this. If strict enough, it would stop the coy young lady from making friends on the side and might, perhaps, increase the number of marriages, for the young lady would marry just to get rid of the chaperon. But, seriously, I think that a great deal of this promiscuous flirting and 'mashing' which goes on daily on the streets and in these places could be broken up by a closer supervision over our children. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

The propaganda of the theatrical men to combat the prosperity of the picture theaters by reducing the price of gallery seats is apparently in full swing. The Buffalo Enquirer in a double-column, double-leaded, ten-point article, talks about the decline of the moving picture theater, and further says that few of the "canned" drama houses that offer nothing but film pictures and an illustrated song or two are paying expenses. In reading some more of the same sort of stuff it is well to bear in mind that the theaters of the speaking stage advertise in local papers. Few picture theaters do. Far be it from the writer to intimate that this consideration was of sufficient import to call forth this:

"Prominent theatrical managers and promoters believe the melodrama will come into its own again before long, and that the picture shows will be relegated to the heap that now contains the Mss. of many a long-ago-forgotten ten, twenty and thirty melodrama. The public's taste, so quickly changed, will not remain sincere to a thing that is speechless, and the return of the good, old-fashioned play where the hero saves the farmer's beautiful daughter, the old homestead and all from the dastardly villain, is assured."

Is it not to laugh?

A New England newspaper quotes the "moving picture distributing agency for the United States" as estimating that four billion people saw the picture shows last year and says these figures are almost staggering. Which is quite right, if the figures are correct. However, as this would mean that approximately eleven million people attend picture shows every day in the year, or one in eight, the exaggeration is apparent. Carrying the figures still further, it would mean for the 12,000 picture theaters of the country an average daily attendance of over 900. Of course, if the estimate were intended to apply to the world rather than to the United States it might not be so far from being right.

The Social Purity League of Albuquerque, N. M., has petitioned for, among other things, a censor for the picture shows. The Albuquerque Journal says: "As to censors for the picture shows, we believe this is a good place to go slow. We have seldom seen any moving pictures here that were even faintly suggestive. What moving pictures we have seen in Albuquerque are wholesome in tone, their thrills are healthy ones and the proprietors are to be praised for exhibiting only such as can offend no sense of decency or propriety. We think that the Albuquerque moving picture shows need a vote of thanks more than a censorship."

All of which will strike those who attend shows for the good that is in them as sound common sense. The motto of the Garter might well be quoted against many of the censorious Social Purity Leaguers.

The Appellate Division of the New York State Supreme Court has upheld the decision of the lower courts that the Dewey Theater, of New York City, violated the fire laws of the city by permitting standees. The ruling means that no person is to be permitted to stand in the aisles or in the space behind the orchestra seats in any theater, the Metropolitan Opera House and Academy of Music, which have outside foyers, alone being exempt. The penalty for violation of the rule is a fine of $50.

Mr. Wm. E. Smith, of H. A. Mackie Co., has just returned from a very successful trip up the Hudson Valley in the interest of his company. Mr. Smith on Saturday, July 15th, was pressed into service to run off the Dante's "Inferno" picture before a private audience at the Casino Theater in this city, using a Power's cameragraph No. 6.

As this picture is composed of five reels of about 1,000 feet each it will be seen that the release of this wonderful subject will, no doubt, be awaited with much interest by the public. That the Mackie Company are equal to any emergency we will state word was received at their office at 10 a.m. and a complete installation and equipment to run the picture was ready at the Casino two hours later, and was a decided success in every particular.

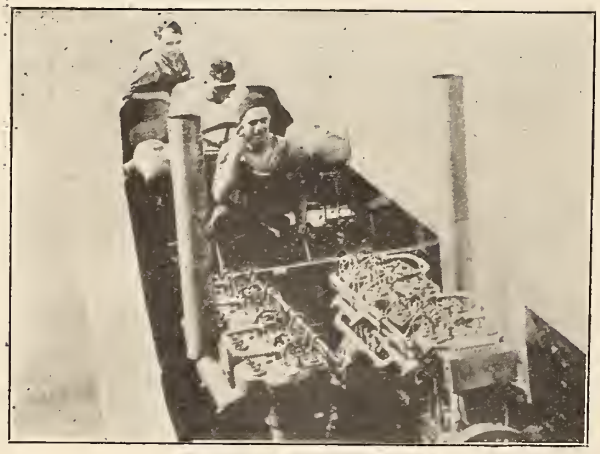
This picture of motor craft is so wonderfully and thrillingly shown, that one is struck with amazement, not only at the numerous boats which dash hither and thither, but at the daring of those who must have faced the greatest of peril in order to have accomplished the herculanean task of such startling depiction. Think of it! You sit quietly in your seat and within a few yards of you goes dashing by the famous "Disturber II" and "Hoosier Boy" and a host of others.



A POWERFUL RACER

Now flashing by comes the hydroplane, well named indeed, for it skims along the waves seeming to leap from crest to crest in its terrific flight. But there are hundreds and hundreds of others and that great twenty mile course is dotted with them. We see them make difficult and hazardous turns in clouds of spray and covered with foam of the sea, and we hold our breath in deep amazement at all!

Among the many renowned men of the aquatic world gathered at this regatta is Commodore Pugh, of Chicago, owner and chief pilot of the "Disturber II." We are little concerned about these great and knowing ones, however, for we are now looking at those wonderful demonstrations which men have come hundreds of miles to witness, though we are viewing them with much ease and comfort, and scarcely a thousandth part of the cost.

This is quite a creditable undertaking and with every facility at their command while at the regatta, the producers have not neglected the artistic views in the form of beautiful sporting effects and scenic sights on the Mississippi. As the celebration was classed as a water carnival, and the town of Dubuque was dressed in holiday attire, very fine pictures were obtained in the making of the whole event. It is altogether an up-to-the-minute topical subject.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS

(From Our San Francisco Correspondent.)

Picture shows in San Francisco are plugging along in the same way as usual; most of them are making money, and there is not much of the sensational in their programmes. Without exception, however, the pictures are well projected and the houses comfortable.

That is more than I can say of New York, unless it has altered in the last few weeks.

Berkeley is awakening. We used to call it the "Bedroom of San Francisco," but the name will have to be changed now. The erection of a splendid hotel began the fuss. Then realty expansion almost without a parallel, and the coming of three new lines of railroads, the constant aggressiveness of the University folks, and the passing of one or two "store front" shows into deserved oblivion, all helped. And, would you believe it, this city of splendid homes and aristocratic environments, has elected a Socialist Mayor, and the Sullivan Considine people are erecting a new house to cost about $75,000.

In the center of the city has been opened as fine a picture theater as I have seen in the West. It is built for, and not adapted to the business, and is known as the "Rex."

The owners of the Lyric in Oakland will erect a new theater on Broadway, to accommodate 2,500 people. Work will be started within the next week or two and as the Lyric has always been in the van of progress, we may look for something good. They know how to do it, and, what is more to the point, they have the coin.

The big toads in the picture puddle out here are waiting with "bated breath" for the decision of location for the big fair in 1915. As soon as this is known, there will be a rush for five-year leases on desirable sites, and we may look for the opening of several new houses.

SHE HAD "HER WAY"—WHICH AFFORDS US AN OPPORTUNITY OF RELEASING A STRONG, POWERFUL DRAMA BY THAT NAME—IT'S A MASTERPIECE, and THEREFORE A Rex!

RELEASED THURSDAY, JULY 27th

A member of one of the Trust exchanges, whose name I am unable to disclose, indicated that a chain of these new houses would be started, and they would go Independent. Well, I don't blame them!

The Independent service out here is too monotonous, and the exchanges do not buy the reels that are wanted. One of the Trust houses buys five copies of every release, and that sort of selection takes some competing with on the Independent side.

I called on the "American Vimograph Company" the other day, wondering what personalities were concealed by that name.

The officers of the company are on Market Street, and are far better fitted and more luxurious than those of the "General," on your Fifth Avenue. The welcome one receives is something unusual, even here in the hospitable West, and I was agreeably surprised to see our old friends, the Duehms, father and sons, in charge of the whole business.

These Duehm boys certainly know how to do a thing "de luxe," and when they rent an office, the first thing they seem to want, and insist on getting, is plenty of elbow room.

They are going to erect a new plant on the coast for the release of Independent films. The greatest point in their favor is that they are not in a hurry. Already they have far more money in hand than most factories had when they were started, but the Vimograph Company will not turn a sod until they have more than plenty, and, believe me, they will not be long in getting it. They have a non-infringing camera, the invention, I am told, of one of the brothers. This they put much value upon, but to my mind the greatest asset any company can have is ability in both business and producing departments, and the Vimograph Company are there with both feet.

There is a run just now on the "prize giving" stunt, and the Silver Palace, on Market Street, tops the bill by giving coupons on a $1,000 runabout. One would think that this sort of thing had been played out, but it hasn't. It is not a bad venture from the theater point of view, but I seriously question the advertising value of the scheme as regards the automobile makers. I have been in three times, and the three nickels I paid brought me good value in good shows, to say nothing of the three winning tickets I got.

Well, if I win, I'll write another letter along about Thanksgiving Day, boosting the giving away of chauffeurs.

The Empress is easily one of the most popular vaudeville houses in the city. It is one of the very few where the pictures are not raced through the machine; the manager evidently believes in giving every turn its full stage time, including the orchestral selection and the pictures, both. And the whole show is excellent.

The Portola is doing good business. The pictures are excellent, and concerning its vaudeville let us say, "it also ran."

A company is being formed for running a chain of fourteen free advertising shows in as many towns throughout the state. It may turn out well, as it has good backing, at least on paper. We shall see. B. L.

"BEHIND THE TIMES"

There is a wholesome moral brought home in "Behind the Times," an Imp picture that is for an early release. The story is one that is encountered in everyday life, and shows the caprices of fashion and the discarding of the things that have proven good for the uncertainties. A pastor, grown aged and infirm, in the service of his congregation, is suddenly discovered by the fashionable women of his church to have outlived this usefulness. His teachings are antiquated, and his views too stringent. His dress is old-fashioned, and his powers of oratory waning. The women meet and decide to depose him and install a younger man. Their plans crystallize, a young Adonis is called to the pulpit, and the old minister retired on a reduced salary. The women are delighted with the newcomer and he becomes a social lion immediately. The new pastor, a leader in social affairs, has no time for visiting the less important members of his flock. A poor woman becomes ill, and he declines to go to her bedside, having an appointment to go motoring. The old pastor is summoned, and goes to his old friend and ministers to her comfort. The child of the president of the leading society becomes ill with a contagious disease, but the new minister will not enter the house. Then it is that the old pastor shows his true worth. He braves the dangers of contagion, visits the home of the woman, who was instrumental in taking the sunshine from his life, and prays for the child, who almost immediately rallies and lives. The story closes with the old pastor—the true man of God—the man behind the times, reinstated in the pulpit he has occupied for years—his worth recognized.

Washington, D. C., July 17th.

The Solax Film Company has been spending considerable time in the Capital City, making a number of photo plays in which the United States Fifteenth Cavalry has played an active part, not only in displaying fine horsemanship, but in taking some of the roles of the plays. So it will not be long before Washington will have these officers and their associates returned to us in film form in our moving picture theaters. We will recognize them, and I believe we will be surprised. It is rather unusual to have United States cavalry loaned for the purpose of motion pictures, and this courtesy was due to the personal friendship that Director Melville, of the Solax Company, has at Fort Myer. In addition to the special photo plays that were expected to be enacted here on this visit, some additional scenarios were "rigged up" in order to secure special characters at the fort, especially that of "Buster, the Mascot."

Fortunately, the weather was deliciously hot for the players, with plenty of sunshine, so an excellent set of reels is anticipated. The Solax Company is fortunate in having a real cavalry perform in its photo plays, for so much of the stagecraft of to-day is make-believe. In this respect, however, the motion picture silent dramas have the advance over the stage dramas in that they can use the open and secure real scenes as they happen.

Mrs. Blache was here a part of the time the Solax Company remained in Washington, and was seen by the manager of the Washington Film Exchange, headquarters for Independent goods, and by others in the motion picture business. Mr. Melville has also seen some of the folks about town, though most of his time has been spent about Fort Myer. He is so well pleased with the results obtained with this visit, and has seen so many other possibilities about Washington that he anticipates making a return engagement with his company of silent players, when even bigger things will be secured.

TOM MOORE

An ovation for the Independents of Washington is the recent voluntary entry of Tom Moore to these ranks—Tom Moore, the pioneer moving picture man of the Capital City and its vicinity, who for years conducted the only film exchange in this locality, and who has always been such a strong upholder and builder of the Licensed films. Why? Because Tom Moore says he was not able to get such service as he was willing to pay for from the General Film Company, which controls the Licensed service in this vicinity. The Independents held out no indueements to Mr.

It is a reproduction of a whole page advertisement contracted for a period of 16 weeks. This is going some for independent pictures.

Moore, nor did they try to secure his patronage. He was simply looking for a square business deal, and the Washington Film Exchange presented the best place to secure it. He handles a rather expensive service and will be an excellent customer. "I gave the Licensed men every opportunity to serve me, for having spent much of my energies handling such goods, I naturally have a warm regard for the Association people, no matter who may be at the head, but—well, I must give my patrons some consideration in the quality of pictures in my houses."

Since Mr. Moore is at the head of the Moore Amusement Company most of the houses under his control will show Independent pictures—perhaps all of them will, if such will be permitted for business ends. Several of the theaters are already using this service, the last on to enter the ranks being the Plaza, Mr. Moore's special pet which has been identified with this pioneer of the picture business for a number of years, and over which the Moore Film Exchange was located. Here will be shown first-run pictures, making a specialty of those photo plays acted by "Little Mary" and Marion Leonard. Always one of these favorites will be shown, and often both, in the daily program. With the Plaza in the field, Ninth Street has three Independent houses within two blocks of each other, all having first runs. It is possible there will be some good-natured competition at times.

The Virginia added to its special featuring of "Macbeth," by engaging Mr. T. Hardy, of the Columbia Players, to give explanatory remarks during the course of this reel. This helped the audience to the better understanding of the scenario reproduction of the Shakespeare drama, which can scarcely be properly followed unless one is familiar with Macbeth—at least such was the case with the reel being shown at the Virginia. Mr. Hardy, who is known on the dramatic stage, is so well acquainted with the Shakespearean plays that he was able to give a few remarks to fill in the gaps as well as recite many of the passages as performed on the screen.

Manager Brylawski is advertising a first-run service at the Colonial and Pickwick Theaters.

As yet the Washington Correspondent has been unable to get a personal interview with the manager of the General Film Company as to why so many of his former patrons have found it more profitable to secure the Independent service.

Few Western pictures have brought forth more real laughter than the "Girl and the Bronco Buster," by the Solax Company. It was no use trying to keep quiet, the spectators just had to laugh when the bronco was ridden to win the girl. Another film which called forth demonstration was the "Pirates of 1920." There are several intense climaxes in this film which met applause from the onlookers. The first of these films was given its initial public showing at the Empress, while the "Pirates of 1920" was given a simultaneous debut at this theater and the Virginia.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, July 19.—There has been the liveliest kind of a fight for the Coronation pictures, which came to town the first of the week, and which brought great crowds to the three theaters where they were shown. Long before the little gilded crown adorned the dome of thought of George V., Harry Hale, with his usual enterprise, had made arrangements for the Coronation pictures to be shown at the Lyric, and he received word that he would get them. He had booked them for the 20th of the month, I believe, but it wasn't long before Mr. Hale became aware of the fact that the other managers, those dealing with the Sales Company, were likely to get the Independent pictures of this historic event in ahead of him, so he got busy and hurried them up. The Scenic and the Photo Play theaters were also after them, as was Eddie Gavrel, who purchased the Lyceum and who is using Patent Company pictures. Eddie told me that he intended to get the Coronation reels a little before Mr. Hale. Whether or not he was aware that the other two Independent houses would also secure them he did not state. The managers of the Scenic and Photo Play theater came to me last Saturday and asked me to announce in the Bulletin that they would show the reels Monday. Mr. Hale also stated that he would have them on exhibition the same day, while Mr. Gavrel, seeing that the other three houses had "beat him to it," cancelled his order.

It was as lively a bit of juggling for pictures as has been seen here in many days, and, in the end, the Lyric got the better of the argument, for the reason that they had the pictures two days, while the Scenic and Photo Play used them only Monday.

All of the three theaters were packed to the doors. The pictures made a big hit here and were much appreciated. Mr. Hale lost no time in getting busy when he saw that two of his competitors were likely to slide the reels in ahead of him, and the two gentlemen in question were also lively enough to get them here the same day that Mr. Hale showed his pictures. As it was we had Independent and Trust product of that event at the same time and the patrons visited all of the three theaters. So far as business went it did more good than harm for the three houses to show them the same day. After seeing the Trust Coronation reels they visited the Independent houses and looked those pictures over, whereas, had any one house had the monopoly of the pictures they would have been "ancient history" had another manager run them a few days later. I heard much criticism on the posters, all of which was favorable. and the poster the Sales Company put out. while not correct as to details in all respects was a great "flash" and caught the eye, which was what it was intended should be done.

In a conversation recently with Mr. Hale he informed me that he was in no way responsible for the Photo Play and the Scenic theaters having their licenses taken away from them because, while running reels received from the General Film Company, they also used an Independent feature, "The Fall of Troy," for which they were punished by the Trust. When, in a previous letter, I stated that these two houses had lost their licenses because a manager in this city had laid information against them, the authority for that statement was very authentic. Mr. Hale is most emphatic in his denial.

"Whoever told you that I complained to the General Film Company is a blankety-blank-zim-zum, wiggety-piggety liar"—and then some. "I never said one word against those two houses running that Independent picture," he continued, "and I would not do so. The mere fact that they are competitors of mine does not make it necessary for me to 'knock' them, and that is something that I have never done and never would do."

The much discussed fight between local managers and the city authorities over the refusal of the former to pay the first installment of the license, which amounts to $200 a year, and which was taken to Chancery Court, was decided against the managers. When the city collector visited the picture houses and asked for the first installment of the license, which amounted to $100, he was turned down, the statement being made that the managers thought the license was too much to pay in view of local conditions. Arrests were made one night as the theaters were about to close. Hon. Alonzo Curl, former Chancellor, had been engaged to take the case from the city to Chancery Court, so when the managers were cited to appear at police headquarters Judge Curl immediately visited the home of Chancellor Henderson, had a writ of habeas corpus issued and the hearing set for the following morning. It was most interesting. Witnesses for the city and the managers were placed on the stand and an effort was made to show that the city council had no authority to increase a license once it had been fixed at a certain figure, but the attorney for the city showed by recent act of the Legislature that the city council could raise or abolish a license at its will; and. of course, the ordinance was held to be valid and the managers lost the case. It was stated when the suits were first brought that an appeal would be taken in the event of the managers losing the same, but there appeared to be so little chance for any favorable action coming their way in an appeal that they decided the best thing to be done would be to take the decision as final and pay the license, which they did. The city and the managers have now buried the hatchet and all is well.

One attraction this week at the Airdome deserves special mention. Lionel Lawrence, the first American actor, it is said, to star in "The Devil," is filling a week's engagement at this theater and is meeting with great success. He produced for the opening bill, "For Love and Honor," a play that has never before been seen in this city and one that scored a great success. Mr. Lawrence is an actor of great ability and his supporting company was excellent. Patronage the entire week was of the "S. R. O." order.

The Great Northern reel, "As a Man Soweth," was here during the week and, I thought, just a little overdrawn. Possibly it would have been all right for foreign audiences, but the contrast was too marked. The conclusion of the picture, though, was most forcible and the lesson it set out to impress on one's mind was not lost.

Nestor gave us a very stirring reel in "The Gunfighter" and Lux, with "Foolshead as a Waiter," was also enjoyed. Poor Fooishead, he had almost as much trouble as "Happy Hooligan." Bison came across with a winner in "Blacksnake's Treachery," and the little stunt "Blacksnake" pulled off with the rattler sent shivers through us. It was a most interesting picture. Rex's "Fate" was greatly enjoyed and the novelty of the picture appealed to the public. Thanhouser's "Coffin Ship," while not very far at sea, nevertheless told a story, the point of which was not lost, and if ever a firm made good on a production it was on their "Declaration of Independence," which caught the town as no other reel here this week did. It was a magnificent picture and the familiar scene taken from the historic painting brought round after round of applause. That was a reel that should be preserved for posterity. It has an historical value second to no other picture that has been released in months, and I hope that at least one copy will be saved. What a won-

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

THE MICHIGAN STATE CONVENTION OF EXHIBITORS

Mr. Dintenfass, of the Champion Film Co., and Mr. Horsley, who were appointed to represent the Sales Co. at the State Convention of Michigan, arrived at Detroit on Wednesday, July 5th, and they met the boys that day at the Meeting Hall, where the exhibitors were busy in a conference.

Mr. Dintenfass sent in his card and he was immediately interviewed and he took the opportunity of inviting the entire meeting, at the expense of the Sales Co., to a luncheon. The invitation was accepted with three large cheers, and it was but a short time before about thirty-five exhibitors, of which the majority were Independent, also representatives of the Patents Co.'s exchanges, and Mr. Hardin, who is the representative of the Edison Co., found themselves at the festive board and doing justice to a hearty repast.

Everything seemed to have been going smoothly until the chairman requested Mr. Dintenfass to deliver the after-dinner remarks. The "Champ" pilot found himself somewhat in an embarrassing position, owing to the fact that he had to say things which were no doubt unpleasant to the representatives of the Patents Company, but since the dinner was solely intended for the exhibitors, and as he was not to be daunted by the presence of any member of the Patents Company, he in his remarks gave vent to his feelings by encouraging the exhibitors to organize and stick together and he told them that this kind of organization gave birth to an Independent movement, and to the Independent manufacturer and finally to the organization of the Sales Co., which has delivered the exchangeman and the exhibitor at large from the house of bondage, and from the yoke of the Patents Co.

He also told them that there was no question but what the Sales Co. was deserving of a great deal of credit, and they ought to be appreciated, not only by the Independent exhibitor but also by the Patents Company exhibitor, for Mr. Dintenfass pointed out that without the Independent movement and the Sales Co. the Trust exhibitors would, no doubt, have endured very much more hardship than they even have under the present conditions.

We are informed that as a result of this meeting the exhibitors have organized for the betterment of conditions and for the elevating of the industry at large, which is highly commendable.

"HER WAY." REX RELEASE, JULY 27th

CHICAGO LETTER

The fact is becoming more evident every day that unless managers, operators, exchange men, manufacturers and producers take more interest in their respective work the interest in moving pictures is going to die out.

The five-cent theaters in the loop district are becoming worse every day and at present it is next to impossible to see a good picture put on in its proper manner, unless business is quiet. During busy hours you would go blind trying to watch the "Race Horse Picture Plays." Imagine 1,000 feet of film projected through a machine in eight or nine minutes and you will more clearly understand what I mean. It has also become a fad these days to daub up a screen with cheap silver paint, leaving it in such a streaky condition as to spoil any picture with sky or black in it.

If a theater cannot afford one of the various improved screens now on the market it would be much better to use the old-time white cloth drop.

Operators, too. Some operators should give a whole lot more attention to their screen while projecting a picture on it.

It is nothing unusual to see the lower half of the picture brown for two or three minutes, and when the operator finally does feed his lamp he will freeze the carbons and separate them again, in other words, make and break instead of knowing how far to feed without freezing.

Dissolvers were made to blend one slide into the other, but you would never know it the way I have seen slides run at some loop houses.

I do not want the operators to take offense at these remarks. Poor fellows, I know how you are pushed for time, etc., making haste necessary, but try to convince your manager by showing how much improvement a minute or two more will make in your show, and the satisfaction it gives the patrons and you will win.

The exchange men should be ashamed of some poorly inspected reels operators have to contend with and at present with so many film cleaners at their disposal there is no excuse for dirty rainy film when it is only a week or two old.

Manufacturers should have more accurate printing and perforating machines so as to eliminate the jumping out of frame business in new pictures and also the jumpy ride I see all the way through some.

And last but not least, Mr. Producer, just one question: I would like to ask why do all motionized actors and actresses after opening the inevitable letter throw the envelope on the floor? Is that true to life? Ever see anyone do that in their own home?

The Crusaders Seen by Exchange Men and Exhibitors

In accordance with our letter of invitation from Tom Quill, manager World's Best Film Co., we hied ourselves to Laemmle's exhibition rooms last Tuesday, where we met some thirty exhibitors and exchange men all waiting to see "The Crusaders," which was to be run off for our special benefit.

After waiting fifteen minutes or more we found out the operator was out to lunch, so yours truly volunteered to handle the crank.

The picture is in four parts and I honestly believe one of the greatest productions of this kind ever staged, surpassing "The Fall of Troy" and is even superior to the "Passion Play," as it has a greater money-making field than the "Passion Play."

The most notable scenes and climaxes are the scene in which "Sophronia Confesses the Theft of the Scone," "The Temptations in the Bewitched Forest," "The Chopping Down of the Forest," and "The Building of the War Towers," and last but not least "The Fall of Jerusalem" and "Triumphant Entry of the Crusaders."

During the hour and a quarter consumed in viewing this picture not a soul in the crowd lost interest and, take my word for it, it takes something out of the ordinary to keep a bunch of exhibitors quiet that long.

When the scene depicting the temptations in the forest was run, showing the ballet of fairies, Joe Hopp, of the Standard, remarked that his forefathers never told him about anything like that in Jerusalem.

The Cines Co. certainly outdid themselves in the making of this feature, and a great and long future is in store for it.

Mr. Quill says the states are selling fast and exhibitors around Chicago are wild to book it in their houses.

MANUFACTURERS' SYNOPSES of FILMS

THE PERILS OF A WAR MESSENGER

Champion Release July 31st

The mission that Joe undertook was hazardous in the extreme—an incursion into and through the Federal lines, right into the city of Washington, for the purpose of obtaining the plans for the manufacture of gun caps, the most useful destructive commodity. The Confederates were sorely in need of them, and especially the Army of Northern Virginia.

The Confederate Secretary of War had ordered the venture and Joe was fulfilling it. He hid in haystacks, pilfered the guns of sleeping sentries, was pursued and shot at, escaped detection under the noses of pursuers while secreted in a fireplace covered with ashes. In the last ruse he was aided by a sympathetic maid.

On the field of battle a dying youth entrusts Joe with a ring for his sister at home. This girl is the daughter of a man who had befriended Joe and he therefore gladly accepts the service, also for the sake of the lost brother.

When he had successfully accomplished the great mission he set out upon and brings back and places the plans in the hands of the Secretary he was awarded the commission of captain for his valiant service. But he refused it.

When he returned to that sweet-faced girl who had won his love, we rejoice in the bliss and happiness which must come to him for he was deserving of it all.

The sequence of incidents are so blended and faithfully carried out and the historical value is of such instructiveness that the skeptic of moving pictures will become a firm adherent of the industry.

"HER WAY"

Rex Release July 27th

Woman's infidelity to man is seldom countenanced by man, is often punished and never forgiven. But man's unfaithfulness to woman is often judged with more leniency. For woman, after all, does sin less and is quicker to pardon and forgive—yes, and even make a sacrifice for the erring one.

Mr. and Mrs. Graham have arranged to go to the opera, but at the eleventh hour Mrs. Graham gets a headache and persuades her husband to go himself. Mr. Graham leaves for the train to take him to town and the opera, but misses it by a few moments. So he returns home to discover his wife's infidelity. He sees her in the garden with Mr. Norton, his neighbor. He realizes that she has feigned illness to be home just for this purpose; in anger and pain at the sight, his first impulse is to kill both, and he goes into the house to obtain his revolver. While on this errand, however, he meets his little daughter, just about to retire, and stops to chat with her. The child, in their talking, enters the heated heart and calms it. He remembers suddenly that the false woman is this child's mother, remembers many little things which in his rage had no place in his mind, and he determines to follow a different course in meeting out punishment to the sinners. Norton has ruined his home, he will ruin Norton's. So he goes to Mrs. Norton and tells her of her husband's infidelity, tells her he is determined to wreak vengeance upon the tempter and that she has but one alternative of preventing his shooting her husband on sight. She must elope with him within an hour. The woman, suffering from the blow caused by her husband's faithlessness, acts like a true heroine. Her heart rankling at the thought of his deceit, she is still true woman enough to sacrifice herself for his well-being. She consents to meet Mr. Graham in an hour.

Norton returns home and is met by his accusing wife, who demands to know where he has been. He sees at once that the woman has more than mere suspicions and he confesses all. The moment is a tense one—it is just fifteen minutes to the hour allotted by Graham. She must meet him within fifteen minutes or her husband pays the penalty for his transgression, the last penalty he would ever pay for any misdeed. She tells her husband to go upstairs to get something for her and while he is gone dons his clothes and walks out on the veranda. Graham, waiting some distance away, has seen the hour go by and he concludes that Mrs. Norton has changed her decision. When he sees what is apparently the figure of Mr. Norton on the veranda he is true to his word—and shoots. As the bullet strikes her, the hat falls from her head and Graham realizes his mistake.

The Providence that directs matters in this world sees to it that the heroine lives and when Norton realizes the sacrifice his wife has made for him there is born in him a love for her that verges on worship.

THE ENGAGEMENT RING

Great Northern Release July 29th

A fisher lad, Jim, and his lass are seen walking along the beach washed by the incoming tide. They have quarrelled, as lovers sometimes do, and to give force to her decision to end everything between them, the wilful maiden takes the engagement ring from her finger and throws it into the sea. Arriving home, the girl is visited by a once-rejected suitor to her hand, who notices the absence of the engagement ring, and is inspired with fresh hope. The young lady is racked with remorse, and is love-sick. Jim, meanwhile, goes fishing, and amongst his catch is a fine piscatorial specimen, inside the mouth of which he finds the ring. At the village tavern he plays cards and wins from the rejected lover the emblem of his troth, given him by the girl. He now has the two rings, much to the chagrin of the other man, who follows him when on a fishing expedition, determined to get the ring back. At sea they quarrel, fight and fall overboard, and to save his own life, Jim has to let the rejected lover drown. On returning to shore, he is accused of murder, but the good character, which is given him by a friend, saves him, and by the instrumentality of the same friend he is enabled to win his bride.

"TRUTH SHALL PREVAIL"

Yankee Release August 4th

The mother, with her son, visits an old friend of her husband's in hopes that she may secure a position for her boy in his office. The boy meets with the gentleman's approval and is engaged as a stenographer.

In the office is a young man who has been living beyond his means. He robs his employer of a sum of money and to throw suspicion from him places some of the money in the boy's desk. The employer discovers the loss of the money, a detective is called, and in his search the detective finds the money in the boy's desk. The boy is accused of the crime, he protests his innocence to no avail, his employer decides that the law must take its course, the boy is arrested. The mother learns of her boy's arrest, she goes to the employer and pleads with him to spare her boy. Her pleadings are in vain. The employer declares he can do nothing toward freeing her son, he has committed a crime and should pay the penalty.

The guilty clerk is troubled with a guilty conscience and takes relief from his troubled thoughts by excessive drinking. While walking across a street he is hit by an automobile and injured. The accident occurs in front of the boy's mother's home. He is carried in the house and taken care of by the boy's mother. He has been treated so kindly by the mother that he decides the boy shall suffer no longer. He makes a confession of his crime, on the strength of which the boy is released from jail.

The employer expresses his regret of having dealt with the boy so harshly, reinstates him in the office in a higher position.

In the meantime the guilty clerk has recovered from his injury. The boy's mother begs the detective who is to take the clerk to jail to allow her to take the clerk to the employer's office; she decides to plead with the employer in the clerk's behalf. The mother with the detective and clerk come to the office; she realizes that the employer has decided that the clerk shall be punished, but hopes to soften the employer's heart. The employer remains firm and the clerk is taken away to jail.

"THE SEA VULTURES"

Yankee Release July 31st

A fitting name for the cowardly and despicable characters who lure ships from their path by false beacons and then when they are wrecked pick the very bones clean.

When the wreckers of this story had completed their dastardly work of luring and wrecking a ship upon the rocks they began looking among the wreckage for valuables. Although there was not enough left of the ship that would sustain life on the angry sea, the wreckers were surprised to find among the wreckage a young baby, who came through the ordeal safe and sound watched and guarded by the Higher Power and All-Seeing Eye.

The wrecker captain, hardened as he was, could not resist the unconscious appeal of the innocent little life, and with a tenderness not attributed to his calling, he takes the babe and adopts her as his own, lavishing all the love of his pent-up nature upon her.

The child grows to beautiful womanhood and in spite of her environment becomes a sweet womanly girl, beloved by the reckless and lawless companions of her father. Her beauty, noble character and sweet womanly ways gradually softens the heart of her adopted father and when the opportunity presents itself, at her pleading and for her sake, he begins his life of reformation.

This does not suit his former companions, who do not cease luring unsuspecting ships upon the rocks with their false beacons, until caught and apprehended by the Government. The revenue officials led by a brave Yankee officer find the home of the wreckers among the rocks of the dangerous coast. Amid these surroundings the revenue officer meets the adopted daughter of the wrecker captain and learns from her of her father's desire to reform.

With information furnished by her and her adopted father he captures the gang of wreckers after a hazardous chase among the dangerous rocks and reefs. Young, beautiful and sweet, the daughter of the wrecking captain charms the revenue officer and before he leaves the scene of his recent victory he wins her for his wife.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN

Thanhouser Release August 1st

According to the tale found in the ancient annals, the little town of Hamelin, in Hanover, found itself five hundred years ago overrun with rats. The citizens tried every way to abate the plague but without result. Finally a mysterious stranger appeared in the town and offered for the sum of 1,000 guilders to clear the place of vermin. His offer was accepted, for the Mayor and Council were at their wits' end and willing to try any expedient.

The stranger was a piper and the music he played lured the rats out of their hiding places. They followed him to the river, where they plunged in and were drowned.

When the piper returned to the Council and demanded his pay he found the city rulers ungrateful and dishonorable. They repudiated their bargain and told the Piper to take 15 guilders and begone, for he was shabby and ragged and they thought they could swindle him with impunity.

But the piper had his pipe left and it was still potent, as the townsmen learned to their sorrow. He played another tune and this time it was the children who followed him. They marched out of the city behind him and the citizens awoke to find that all their homes were desolate.

One version of this old legend is that one little boy, a cripple, was unable to keep up with the others and when they followed the piper into a hollow hill he was so far behind that the doorway was closed before he limped up. It is said that he lived a lonely life in a city of sorrow, where the voices of children except his own was not heard.

But there is reason to believe that the piper was not so hard-hearted as some chroniclers have maintained. How could he make a whole town unhappy, ceaselessly unhappy, and how could he blight the existence of a poor little crippled boy?

So we like to believe that the piper listened to the prayers of the cripple and restored to him his playmates. And that after a time there was joy in Hamelin and that its citizens learned a lesson that dishonesty never pays and that in the long run if you cheat a man or a woman you may expect some day in some way to pay the penalty.

THE JUDGE'S STORY

Thanhouser Release August 4th

A poor, friendless negro stood at the bar of justice on trial for his life. The evidence was purely circumstantial, but even the lawyer assigned to defend him was skeptical as to his innocence and indifferent as to the result. The prisoner told a straight story, but others swore that the victim had identified him in a manner before he died. The trial proceeded speedily and the outcome looked black for the prisoner. The aged judge on the bench, who had listened to stories of sordid crimes for years, heaved a sigh of relief when the lawyers concluded their arguments and started in to sum up. His charge was brief for there was little he felt called upon to say.

Just as the jurors were preparing to file out there was an interruption. A feeble old colored woman forced her way through the crowd, and falling on her knees before the judge's bench, implored "Massa Jack" to save her boy.

The judge looked down and recognized her. He showed strong emotion, called the wondering jurors back to their seats and told them that before they started in to consider their verdict he wanted to tell them a story of fifty years ago.

At that time a young Confederate officer while in camp received word that his mother was fatally ill. He secured leave of absence and started for his old home. It was a trip full of difficulties because the Union troops were all around that neighborhood, but he managed it somehow and was in time to receive his mother's dying blessing.

On his trip back the officer was unlucky enough to be seen by the enemy and was wounded, but managed to elude them. Finally he took refuge in a negro cabin, where a colored woman took him in, cared for him, hid him and when searchers came denied that he was there.

Her six-year-old boy also did what he could to help the wounded soldier, finally securing him a horse, on which the officer rode away.

As the soldier started off a Union trooper appeared and called upon him to surrender. But the Confederate, noting that the other was unmounted, put spurs to his horse and galloped away. The Union soldier seeing his enemy escaping, knelt and took careful aim at him, but just as he was about to fire the little negro boy jumped forward, grasped his musket and struggled to take it from him. There was a shot and the boy fell wounded. The Confederate would have gone back to his assistance, but other mounted foes appeared and he saw it would be useless, so he made his escape. After the war the Confederate tried to find the child to reward him, but utterly failed.

"I was the officer," the judge concluded. "The prisoner at the bar was the child who saved my life. Some persons have come forward here to testify to his good character. He says he is innocent of this crime and I believe him, for a child who would risk his life to save another could hardly develop into a cowardly assassin."

The jurors agreed with the judge and when the real slayer was captured later they were glad that they had done so. And the judge saw that the man who had saved his life spent the rest of his days in the happiness and comforts that were surely his due.

"THE BI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT MOBILE, ALA."

"Imp" Release July 31st

Striking scenes in the recent celebration at Mobile, Ala., showing the development of a Southern city and the enterprise shown in furnishing the fête event. Soldiers and civic societies participate in the street pageants in darzling, glittering spectacles, the whole combining to make a film of interest from a scenic and historical standpoint. The celebration was attended by an immense crowd and was one of the biggest events ever held in the South.

"THE SKATING BUG"

"Imp" Release July 31st

Convict No. 34 makes his escape from prison by sealing the wall and, dropping outside, easts about for a means of a speedy getaway. He espies a dude about to engage in the pastime of roller skating on the pavement. The convict is desperate, also resourceful and in a jiffy he has appropriated the skates and swapped costumes with the lady-like young man. Once on the skates the criminal shows his familiarity with the footgear by gliding rapidly away. The alarm is given and the escaped prisoner is chased, and chased closely. He has many mishaps, throwing his pursuers off the trail and eluding them by skilful maneuvers and piling them up on the walk and in the street. Hotly pressed, he skates off a dock into the water and the chasers, unable to check their momentum, take impromptu baths, the scene producing material for screams of laughter. The dude is captured and locked up only to be released when the convict is finally captured and restored to his cell.

"THE CALL OF THE SONG"

"Imp" Release August 3d

Hugh Norton and Amy Gordon are sweethearts residing in a village. Hugh is one of the most intelligent young men in the hamlet and Amy is the village school teacher.

Hugh receives an offer to enter the office of a business firm in the city and is elated at his good fortune. He hastens to Amy, flushed with success, to inform her of his prospects. He takes leave of her in her rose garden, which she takes great pleasure in tending. The girl has misgivings, but he tells her he will come back to her with the last rose of summer. It is in the June season and the roses are in blossom.

Hugh goes to the city and it is the old story. He plunges into dissipation, mingles with a fast set socially and becomes enamored of a young society woman.

Amy sends him a pair of slippers that she has embroidered with his initials. He receeives them while entertaining his blasé companions; the package is opened and the gift is tossed about the room, the butt of the jokes of this convivial friends.

Amy visits the village post-office eagerly awaiting tidings from Hugh, only to be disappointed and pitied by the villagers, who know her story. At school she reads the announcement of the engagement of Hugh to the wealthy city woman and the shock is too much for her already overwrought nerves and she loses her reason, heartbroken. She is led about the town by her mother and her friends are saddened and denounce the young man for his fickleness.

At a dinner, surrounded by his companions a street singer appears with guitar. She sings the song "With the Last Rose of Summer I'll Come Baek to You." Hugh listens and it all comes back to him—the parting from Amy—his promise. He looks about him and contemplates his friends. He sees the sham of it all—his neglect of the girl—the unworthiness of his fiancée, who is drinking wine with a half-tipsy companion. It all passes before him like a vision and his better nature asserts itself. He rises half-crazed with remorse and repentance and leaves the group after denouncing the woman.

He goes to his room, finds the slippers and the letters Amy has written him and regards them tenderly. Packing his bag, he hurries to his home town, where he is ostracized by his old neighbors. He hastens to the home of Amy and inquires for her. The mother sorrowfully points to the rose garden. He goes to the rose bower and discovers Amy plucking a rose. The roses have almost disappeared. He sees the girl is demented and he is stricken with remorse as he looks upon her loveliness and realizes he is the cause of her condition. Picking up the guitar he sings "With the Last Rose of Summer I'll Come Back to You." She listens unaware of his presence. With the words—the loved voice—reason gradually returns. She turns to him with a glad look of recognition and is clasped in his arms.

THE DOUBLE ELOPEMENT

Solax Release July 26th

Jim and May are engaged to be married, but fearing that their parents will refuse to give their consent on account of their youth, decide to elope. It so happens that Jim's father and May's mother have fallen in love with each other, and they, too, fearing that their children would not think well of their plan, decide to elope. Unfortunately both couples choose the same night to elope. The ensuing complications can be imagined.

Jim secures an old horse and buggy, and getting May, he drives to the minister. As they stand before that reverend gentleman and are about to be married, they are startled to hear the approach of an auto. As it stops in front of the minister's house, Jim looks out of the window and is astonished to see his papa and May's mamma approaching the house. Thinking the old people are onto their game, Jim and May make a hurried exit through the rear window and jump into papa's car just as that worthy is going into the parsonage with his prospective bride. Papa is no sooner in the parsonage when he hears the chug-chug of his auto. Jim has decided to be on his way in the faster vehicle. Papa rushes out and he and mamma pile into the dilapidated buggy and give hot pursuit.

The old people finally overtake Jim and his girl. The auto has broken down and we see Jim's feet sticking out from underneath the machine, while he vainly tries to put the engine to rights. Papa, greatly excited, and feeling sure that he has now got the thief to rights, jumps out of his slow, but as it proved, much more dependable vehicle, and pulling the person by the feet from underneath the auto, is astonished to see his own son's face. After explanations are offered and everything is made right the happy four take their way back to the parsonage, where a double wedding is soon in progress.

OUTWITTED BY HORSE AND LARIAT

Solax Release July 28th

The story opens with a Western scene, showing a crowd of cowboys lolling about in front of Casey's saloon, amusing themselves with feats of horsemanship and lariat throwing. Among those present is little May, the Rose of the Ranch, and who is dear to the hearts of all the big manly boys. But as she mingles freely among her friends she is approached by Bill, the bully of the town. As he seizes her in his grasp and endeavors to kiss her he is surprised to receive a stinging blow. Turning angrily about he faces his op-

Angell Writes To Me:

Customers don't take the trouble to sit down and write a letter of appreciation unless they're dog-gone well pleased. Now, for instance, take a slant at this dandy letter received by my Minneapolis office from Mr. Hans Angell, manager Lyceum Theatre, Thief River Falls, Minn.: "I wish to express my appreciation of the films which you have been sending us recently. I know that Mr. Morgan (proprietor of the Lyceum) is more than satisfied with them. We are doing very nicely. If you continue sending us stuff like the last six or seven changes we will have the opposition house put out of business in less than a month."

That letter was written right in the very midst of the boiling hot weather. How many of you were "doing very nicely" at that time? And if you really want to do the nicest possible business why in Tophet don't you write to me?

ponent, who proves to be Jack Freeman, a very popular boy of the ranch. The men face each other for a moment and then like a flash Bill draws his gun and is about to shoot Jack when Ned, one of Jack's friends, seeing the danger in which his friend is placed, throws his lariat and catches Bill's hand just as it is descending with the gun.

In a thrice they have Bill tied up, and after bouncing him up and down in a blanket, finish his treatment by dousing him in the horse trough.

After they release Bill he swears revenge, and going to a camp of Mexican renegades, he enlists their aid. They wait by the roadside, and as May passes on her way home, they spring out and carry her away to their stronghold, back in the mountains. Many miles away from friends, and securely tied to a tree, she is about to lose all hope when an idea enters her head. Taking a leaf from a nearby bough, and with a hairpin piercing in its surface a message for help, she sticks the leaf in her horse's bridle and sends him back to the camp. As the faithful horse gallops into the camp he is surrounded by the cowboys, who after a short examination, discover the leaf with the message.

Quickly saddles and bridles are brought forth and the small party is off to the rescue. As they near the rendezvous the boys stay back while Jack, May's lover, approaches with his horse. As he cautiously raises his head above the tall grass he is horrified to see May tied to the tree surrounded by the desperate men, who are discussing her. Jack quickly makes up his mind what to do. Jumping into the saddle, he whips his horse into a whirlwind gallop, and dashing right into the renegades' camp, he picks the girl from the ground and is off before a shot can be fired. The Mexicans quickly lose the trail of the daring American boys, and they return to camp, where things look as if there would be a wedding very soon.

8 Sherwood St., W., July 8, 1911.

A little comedy has just been enacted in the pages of the two trade papers here which may have a little interest for your readers inasmuch as an American company figures prominently therein. The company in question is Selig, whose representative in this vicinity, Mr. E. H. Montague, is a strong believer in publicity and keeps the name of his firm before the trade in a manner which must have much to do with the increased sales the brand has enjoyed since it opened its own offices last week. Bioscope had a "write-up" about Selig, illustrated by a photograph of the premises they occupy in the Film House. Said premises are on the second and third floors; the ground floor is occupied by the Cosmopolitan Film Co., and in the block the latter's prominently displayed name is blotted out, so as not to mar the effect of the Selig marks which liberally bespatter the front of the house.

Cosmo. admired this arrangement so much that they have been led to imitate it. In their turn they commissioned a photographer and this week's Kine. Weekly appears with a photograph of the Film House in which Cosmo's name appears in all its glory of gold paint while, curious to relate, not a trace of Selig appears anywhere. In fact, the effacement in this case is much neater than in the other and Cosmos appears to monopolize the three floors. The joke appears to be on Selig at present, but people in the country who have never seen it must be much exercised as to the real extent of the "Film House." Don't be misled into thinking this affair denotes a feud between the two firms mentioned; it's all done in a good-natured way, don't you know, and probably Montague enjoys the joke as much as anyone.

An old trade acquaintance made a reappearance this week in the person of Mr. G. Stewart, who had charge of the already mentioned Cosmopolitan Company about a year ago. Mr. Stewart has been out of the line since, but talks of possibly returning and may take a trip to South Africa to see if the boom in trade which is reported due there holds out any possibility to the lively picture man. If there are any American manufacturers thinking of investigating that field, Mr. Stewart is open to talk business and any communications sent to this office will be forwarded to him.

On Saturday last a marriage was celebrated at Walthamston which has a double interest for the trade, the bride being a daughter of Mr. J. D. Walker, of Waltindaw, Ltd., the man who first started film hiring in this country, while the happy groom was Mr. A. C. Bartlett, "Arthur" of the New Agency Film Co., who are doing such good business with Ambrosio and other agencies. Mr. Bartlett was with the Waltindaw Co. for several years, for some time as assistant to Mr. R. C. Collier, now presiding over the destinies of the Tyler Film Co., Ltd. The News adds its congratulations to the many already tendered by the trade.

I should like to correct one or two misprints which crept into my notes in No. 25 of the News. The firm which has lost the services of Mr. Walter is Cricks & Martin, not "Crecks," while the last thing Messrs. F. Wilkins & Co. would do would be to supply chairs to churches. I wrote "cinemas"; possibly in making the alteration your linotyper had in his mind the number of sacred edifices which are being transformed into picture theaters on this side.

It is curious to what an extent experimenters have recently devoted their attention to color, to the exclusion of stereoscopic projection, which at one time was, if anything, even more assiduously sought after. I know one gentleman, however, who is working on this problem in a quiet but systematic way and one day he may surprise us with a complete and easily worked process. At present, I understand, he can get the results, but by methods which cannot be regarded as commercial.

When the Eclair Acad subject, "The Hands," reaches your side, see it. I've never seen acting which held as that of this subject does. The story is not a cheerful one; it is set in the precincts of a lunatic asylum and the chief character is a murderous monomaniac, but as drama it is IT, though I wouldn't take a child to see it; and wouldn't, in fact, care to see it myself when in anything but a cheerful mood. Regard it as an example of stagecraft and an exhibition of the power of expression by facial movement and gesture and you will admit that it has never been surpassed.

MR. INSISTER

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK

Mr. Insister Says: "The Pied Piper PIPED till the rats ran into the river, and I'll just INSIST till his reel runs into my place."

RELEASED TUESDAY, AUG. 1 From the Famous Legend

who has come down through the ages in song and story because of his wonderful achievement in driving the rats into the sea with his magical pipes, has been done into a film, as you see, and you should make a strong effort to show your patrons his deeds on the screen. Various versions of the Piper's achievements have been handed down, and the most pleasant of all is the one we have selected. We believe in light and sunshine in stories, and the particular reel is wisely surcharged with these elements. No. 231. Code Word, Piper.

RELEASED FRIDAY, AUG. 4
A STUDY IN HUMAN INTEREST

The Judge's Story

A stern judge from his bench one day casts a cold eye on a trembling negro on trial before him and lapses off into a vivid dream. When he comes out of it, he relates it to the jury and the prisoner at the bar is set free. But the proceeding was just what may have been expected, for the judge's tale, as the jury heard it, could only have brought the one result it did, and it is this remarkable story that we here picture for your enlightment. No. 232. Code Word, Jory.

"Lest you forget"---
We say it yet:
GET A POWER'S No. 6

Power's No. 6 is the only moving picture machine which has been consistently designed to insure long service. The distinctive and characteristic feature of a moving picture machine is the device for producing the intermittent movement of the film. "Power's No. 6" is the only American moving picture machine that has an intermittent movement calculated to withstand hard wear—the only intermittent movement capable of long service at high speeds. It will stand more than four times as much hard service as the ordinary Geneva stop or starwheel and cam movement.

The other parts of "Power's No. 6" have similar strength and durability.

That's why we can guarantee it against wear—and why you can't afford to buy any other kind of machine.

Send for proposition D and let us put you in touch with dealers who will make it easy for you to put a "No. 6" in your theatre.

"The Call of the Song"

(With Special Music)

Without exception this is the most perfectly appointed melodrama and love story produced by any manufacturer within the past year. The special music which goes with the picture makes the whole combination a masterpiece. You simply must get it if you have to hound your exchange day after day. Released Thursday, August 3rd.

On Monday, July 31st, we release a split reel:—"The bi-Centennial Celebration at Mobile, Alabama," a 500-ft. picture of intense scenic and historical interest. On the same reel "The Skating Bug," a daringly clever bit of horse play that will make your people howl. It's the sort of stuff you've been fighting for. Get it!

ANOTHER GIGANTIC BLUFF

Which Will Be Called

Two weeks ago we called attention to the fact that the Motion Picture Patents Company having been completely routed on their so-called camera patents, were resorting to treacherous methods to get exhibitors to give up Independent service through a wholesale series of intimidation.

Quite a number of exhibitors have received summonses from the bluffing old lady, at 80 Fifth Avenue, claiming they are infringing patents numbers 707934 and 722382. This summons reads as follows:

SUMMONS

The President of the United States of America, to
(L. S) John Doe
Greeting:

You are hereby commanded that you ..... personally appear before the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States of America, for the Southern District of New York, in the Second Circuit, in Equity, on the first Monday of August, A.D. 1911, wherever the said Court shall then be, to answer a bill of complaint exhibited against you in the said Court by Motion Picture Patents Company, and do further and receive what the said Court shall have considered in that behalf. And this you are not to omit under the penalty on you of Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars.

Witness, The Honorable Edward B. White, Chief Justice of the United States, at the Borough of Manhattan, in The City of New York, on the 15th day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eleven and of the Independence of the United States of America, the one hundred and thirty-sixth.

GEORGE T. SCULL, Solicitor for the Complainant.
JOHN A. SHIELDS, Clerk.

The Defendant is required to enter appearance in the above cause, in the Clerk's office of the Court, on or before the first Monday of August, 1911, or the bill will be taken pro confesso against it.

J. A. S., Clerk.

Should any of our readers receive one of these summonses, we advise them immediately to send it to their exchange who in every instance, we understand, will take care of the exhibitor's interests by sending the summons on to New York headquarters. The exchange will advise the exhibitor what other information is necessary to accompany this summons to enable the chief counsel to furnish a complete and easy defense. Independent exhibitors need not be distressed or put out in any way by this last colossal bluff on the part of the Patents Company. Practically one line of defense will satisfy for all such cases, and we again wish to call attention to the fact that when the Biograph and George Kleine were fighting Edison interests they demanded that one case should be taken as a criterion for the whole, and the judge declared that no further cases should be brought forward until that was settled and the patents adjudicated. Suit on the Latham Loop patent has been pending for a long time. It is being fought now, and, we understand, is being delayed by the Patents Company. Nothing can be done in this wholesale series of suits until long after a decision is rendered in the suit already pending.

In fact, there can be no possible advantage to the Patents Company by bringing these suits at this time except to intimidate the exhibitor into believing that he is liable to be enjoined and his business interfered with if he continues to use Independent films. There is positively no such danger. The same counsel who have thus far so successfully defended all of these Trust suits, assure us there is not the slightest ground for uneasiness and that the bringing of these suits does not change the legal situation at all.

The patents in question have not yet been adjudicated, and the ideas embodied therein will certainly fail owing to the prior use of the so-called invention claimed in these patents, namely, the Latham Loop and the Pross shutter. We have evidence in our possession of long prior use to the time these patents were taken out, and so have the attorneys for the defense, and it is our opinion that the Independents wil come out with flying colors in this matter, as they have in all others.

Just remember, should you get one of these "bluff slips," take it immediately to your exchange and learn what other information you are to supply with it. The return date mentioned as the one in which you are to personally appear is simply the date on which your attorney is to enter his appearance, a formal matter requiring but a few minutes' time, and if there is time enough this will be done for you from New York headquarters.

Notice has already been served upon the Patents Company that if the time in any case is too short for an appearance and decision is rendered in default, the case will be reopened; so you need not be alarmed or worry yourself in any manner after you have once presented the summons to your exchangeman. There will be ample time for filing the answer later on.

Should one of their hirelings come after you, soliciting your service on the strength of the liability of your being proceeded against if you don't take his service, inform him that you use disinfectants to keep the atmosphere of your place sweet and clean, and that his presence only serves to overwork your disinfecting apparatus.

NATIONAL CONVENTION OF EXHIBITORS

We understand careful arrangements have been made for the National League of Exhibitors holding their convention in Cleveland from the 1st to the 3d of August, inclusive. We understand that exhibitors from all over the states will be present either in person or by proxy, and that discussions for the good of the industry will be the order of the day. Representatives of every film manufacturer, motion picture machine and supply house will be present and exhibit their products. W. A. Pettis, the secretary, has made arrangements for the comfort of everyone who will be present at the convention.

SCALA—KINEMACOLOR

On Thursday evening, July 20th, Mr. Charles Urban presented for the first time in London, England, at the Scala Theater, W., a magnificent new series of Kinemacolor life-motion pictures of the King's Investiture of the Prince of Wales at Carnarvon Castle, all taken by the privilege of His Majesty's Office of Works, from exclusive positions inside the towers and walls and directly facing the dais beneath the four-posted canopy where Prince David received the chaplet. These scenes of the brilliant and historic ceremony are preceded by others depicting the gathering of the Druids and the soldiers, the Ministers of State, the choir of Welsh maidens in their sugar-loaf hats, and the strikingly characteristic crowds of the principality. "All Wales is a sea of song"; and especial attention is given at the Scala to an accurate reproduction of the choral and instrumental music that accompanied the actual ceremony. The films are, in addition to the present series illustrating all the events of the Coronation, etc., and their exhibition will alone occupy about thirty minutes, twice daily.

SIMPLEX PROJECTOR

We understand that representatives of European agencies have been over in New York within the past four or five weeks examining the merits of this machine, and they are so impressed with the value of the same that they are asking for English and Continental agencies. With this in view, Mr. Rich G. Hollaman sailed on the Olympic Wednesday, July 19th, for England to look after the agencies abroad and take care of the patents in the British Patent Office. We are given to understand that the sale abroad bids fair to equal if not eclipse the American sales, and in conversation with one of the Fire Commissioners, he informed us that in a little while he would insist upon every machine being enclosed like the Simplex. This is a matter for other manufacturers to take up.

The circle this week shows a scene from Champion's release of August 7th, entitled "Dewey." It is a stirring story and a film of dramatic and historical interest.

PECULIAR TACTICS

Cleveland, July 19, 1911.

Mr. A. H. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Saunders:—I have just read your article entitled "Peculiar Tactics" in your issue of July 15th, and cannot help writing you a word of encouragement in your good work. I have read many articles in your paper that deserve commendation, and my intentions were to write you ere this, but was lacking time. The part that impressed me the most was:

"Two of the writers state that they have written to a contemporary asking advice, and they are advised (privately and confidentially, of course) to accede to the requests made to them for their own salvation."

Of these tactics of a contemporary I am aware, as I have also received advice in a like manner, and I am glad to say that up to the present writing I do not regret not following same. It is such deceitful and secret tactics that hurt, as the informant poses as a friend. What is good advice for one is good for another, so why not come out in the open and publish same for the benefit of all—this, however, would not serve the purpose of some interests.

What I wish to convey in this letter to the Independent manufacturers and exhibitors is that your paper is the only true friend that they have working for the Independent cause, and I regret very much that you do not receive the unlimited and liberal support of all the manufacturers that you deserve. There is no one who appreciates true and good friends better than myself, and knowing that you have proven yourself such in the Independent cause and to the Independent exhibitor in general, would like to see you get the recognition that you deserve. I am a great believer in the old saying that "Truth will prevail in the long run," therefore, I am confident that if you will keep in your present course, you will, eventually win out.

Wishing you success, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully yours,

E. MANDELBAUM.

We commend the above letter to the attention of all in the Independent ranks. It needs no further comments from us.

WHAT I GAINED BY AN INTERVIEW WITH MR. ALEX. KONTA

By Margaret I. McDonald

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

On my recent interview with Mr. Alex. Konta I was reminded very forcibly of the above verse from Longfellow. I take off my hat to Mr. Konta, who has proposed the founding of one of the greatest, most advanced and economic educational institutions ever before throught of. Mr. Konta is a great man. The thought whose seed he has planted will be blown by the breeze of enthusiasm, and also by the scorching breath of idle criticism, broadcast to take root in mellow soil, in the minds of the other great and near-great of the nation.

The Modern Historic Records Association will have as its founder—I take the stand that it already exists in embryonic form—what I consider one of the master minds of the nation—prophetic, far-seeing, overlooking the labyrinths of the future through which that endless chain of humans wend their way, with the penetration of a seer—such minds, "departing, leave behind them footprints on the sands of time."

I entered the office of the Wall street financier with rather a feeling of misgiving. People who deal largely in hard cash are liable to be as hard as the cash they handle. Not so Mr. Konta. Never did I receive more courteous treatment. In the kindly, gray-haired man I found a healthy, hopeful, kindly spirit—a spirit always young because its interests lie not in the "dead past," but in the present where reside the things of to-day, and in the to-morrow where the things of to-day become and beget the things of to-morrow. When I left the office I felt glad that I had come, for I was dismissed with an assurance of pleasure derived from my visit, and a hope that I might come again. All these things add sunshine to life.

The suggestion of instituting a Hall of Records represents a gigantic undertaking, but one which will, no doubt, be met with approval throughout the Union. Mr. Konta's idea, after the preliminary gathering which will soon be called together to discuss the subject, is to appeal to the large cities in the different states for support in the movement, and eventually, after a firm foundation has been adjusted, to the Government. In a letter to the New York Times, Mr. Konta has said: "The plan which I herewith desire to submit for your consideration is suggested only in its main outlines, to be worked out in detail as it becomes a reality. The Modern Historic Records Association, as the movement might be called, should be based on local organizations, all collaborating with a larger state body, these state societies, in their turn, forming the national association, with its seat at Washington. Inclusion in the Washington records, the crowning honor, would not be bestowed until perhaps fifty years after death, and only by a majority vote of the state associations, whose directors should be men of leading in the community."

For the benefit of those who have not read Mr. Konta's letter, or who do not know of the proposed founding of the Modern Historic Records Association, I will explain that Mr. Konta has proposed the founding of this association for the obtaining and preservation of moving picture films, and phonographic records, illustrating all the principal events in the history of the nation, and also the building of fireproof buildings for the preservation of the same. In his own words: "The fireproof buildings in which the records for preservation would be kept might be made architectural ornaments of their cities. Here in New York, for instance, the building might fitly be made a part of the Hall of Fame, or be located in the vicinity of the Public Library. The State repositories might in a similar manner be erected in close proximity to the legislative or executive mansions, while, finally, in Washington would be erected the national Pantheon of the association, symbolic of the historical importance of the records within its walls."

"Have you some idea of using these films in connection with the schools?" I questioned.

"Oh, certainly," was his reply. But I do not propose to use them for fifty years in that capacity. I am doing this for the love of the thing. I would have nothing to do with it if there was any commercialism attached to it, and if they were used for the schools at once I fear there would be."

Mr. Konta was born in Budapest, one of the most advanced cities of Europe. He brought with him ideas fostered in a city of advancement. In his twenty-six years of residence in America they have been nurtured and developed in a mind free from prejudice. Before entering upon a financial career Mr. Konta was well known as a newspaper man; now we have the culmination of his thought and experience in this unique suggestion which, with a bold stroke of the pen, he has brought to public notice.

I cannot say that I agree with Mr. Konta in the matter of not wishing to use the films compiled for the education of the children of to-day; the wish to escape being connected with commercialism in the matter may have led to his having forgotten that the children of to-day are the parents of to-morrow, and that the restricting of the use of the films and phonographic records for fifty years would be the means of retarding just that number of years the progress of the future.

Let us have the benefit of all advanced ideas to-day—not any later. We need them now.

MOVING PICTURES AND THE FOREIGNER

By A. L. Barrett

Perhaps the most appreciative part of a moving picture audience is the foreign element which is, as yet, ignorant of the English language. These people come from totally different scenes, as a rule, thousands of them from the rural districts, and gaze eagerly at the strange sights of a large city and the always fresh and changing scenes of their surroundings. Since the advent of the picture plays, the foreigners have quickly recognized their value in truthfully portraying in all its various phases, the new life into which they soon become incorporated, and this medium appeals to their emotions as no other could. The reality of the scenery and the life action presented on the screen impress the audience as much as, and perhaps more than, a regular theatrical performance, for every movement, attitude or even the expression on a countenance is depicted in a lifelike manner. At these picture plays there is the same hush of expectation, the thrill of horror at some threatened or actual catastrophe, the warm burst of sympathy, the same excitement, the interest at the adventures of some Romeo and Juliet or mirth at some ridiculous incident, that is to be found at the ordinary theatre, for the simple reason that the picture plays can just as truthfully portray life, though without the medium of words—and truth always prevails—even the truth depicted on the moving picture screen.

In the mixed audiences in any of the poorer sections of the ordinary American city will be found representatives of perhaps every civilized nation, many of whom do not understand the English language, and before their wondering vision flit scenes of which they have perhaps seen the prototype that very day—scenes in the every-day life of a neighborhood like their own—as well as pictured stories of the West and great mining and other great business centers, but all vividly presenting the characteristic life of the land of their adoption in all its varied phases and climates. By Americans and those who have lived here for any considerable length of time, such plays are considered merely as a form of entertainment, but to the uneducated or those ignorant of the language, they form a valuable course of instruction, for in this way the foreigners are enabled to gain a better and clearer insight into the actual life of the nation than would be possible by any other means. In fact, one evening at the moving picture play will teach them more of the manners and customs of their adopted country than a month's residence here would do. It matters not whether the foreigners can speak the language, for the picture play can be understood by them as easily as it can by the native, and although in the mixed audiences we find all sorts and conditions of persons, they are all vulnerable, more or less, to the shafts of the moving picture plays, the pictures being too realistic to admit of any other result, for although they are perhaps telling the simplest story, they are telling it in a manner far more eloquent than is possible by mere words, and the joys, sorows or adventures of the various individuals pictorially portrayed are interpreted so vividly to the audience that no written or spoken language is required, as the actions speak as intelligibly as words. Nothing better than these silent picture stories could have been devised for the rapid instruction of the thousands of foreigners in the habits and methods of American life, and the picture play, eloquent as it necessarily must be when no word is spoken, appeals to the dramatic instinct inherent in almost every one in the audience, be they Saxon, Latin, Slav, Negro or any other race

There is a magnetism in the moving picture which attracts immense numbers of all ranks and ages, and they certainly furnish the only safe and respectable form of dramatic entertainment available to the poorer classes, having completely usurped the old time cheap melodrama, now practically out of existence—in itself an advantage. The picture method of giving drama with the unnecessary vehicle of language eliminated has proved eminently successful, if we may judge by the ever-increasing number of picture play patrons. The pantomime used in the interpretation of the moving picture stories is quite sufficient to convey the meaning, without the medium of dialogue, and the weak form used in cheap melodramas can easily be spared. That even the poorest persons ever went to the cheap melodramatic performances was simply for the want of something better with which to satisfy the natural human instinct for the drama, is evident from the rapid transfer of their allegiance to the so wonderfully popular picture play. The moving picture plays, from an educational, artistic and moral point of view are also of a much superior quality to the one-time popular melodrama, for not even the warmest advocates of this form of amusement (and outside of those who were obliged to patronize them for the want of something better, they were not many) could ever claim that these dramas could or would be used, even at the most remote period, as an educational force, while the moving pictures are so recognized by many, and were very shortly after their invention. The average play presented is creditable to the moving picture industry, many of them conveying a moral, and practically all of them now passing the National Board of Censorship. Certainly no board of censorship restricted the melodrama.

However, moving pictures are not perfect yet, and as they have such an influence over millions of every age, class and condition—and are destined, moreover, to be such a power in education—in fact to be the educational medium of the 20th century—the sooner they are made to conform to the ideas of the clergy and educators—so far as the undoubted purity of every single picture play is concerned—the sooner will the remaining prejudices of this important class be removed, but so long as a few picture play manufacturers and managers persist in manufacturing and presenting plays concerning which there is any question, they will have a handle against the whole moving picture industry. It has taken long and persistent effort on the part of the best friends of the moving picture plays to bring them to their present condition and thus remove the real grounds for the general prejudice that once existed. As a result of this continued persistence, now stretching over several years, the picture plays are gaining more friends daily, but it is also recognized that such a popular institution as they have become can be a vital force in the morals of any nation, and misused can be a source of great evil, but with a nation which is continually receiving an influx of foreigners it is of the utmost importance that only good, clean plays are presented, for first impressions are lasting, and, after all, the foreigner and future American citizen is, to a great extent, what we make him. The motion pictures are filling a long-felt want by providing the poorer classes with an innocent and inexpensive amusement and the advantages to this class are very great, but to the foreigner who does not understand the language they are inestimable. These emigrants cannot attend public school lectures and the various free entertainments provided by the municipal authorities unless they understand English, and there are very few places of entertainment in which their own language is spoken; but even if they are anxious to learn the English language many of them come during the summer months when the schools are closed, and with the moving picture play as a source of inexpensive amusement they are enabled to spend many evenings in which entertainment and instruction are pleasantly combined. Were it only for the benefit of the foreign element, therefore—future American citizens—the plays presented should be only of the highest quality and with an absolutely pure reputation. In this way only can they fully live down all prejudice.

MORE ADVANCEMENT IN THE FILMS

"Romeo and Juliet" Is Announced by Thanhouser

The steady improvement in the quality of the American motion picture that is so pronounced a feature of the present period in picture history, is reflected in the announcement by the Thanhouser Company of a film of "Romeo and Juliet." A large and formidable cast of film actors, headed by George Lessey and Julia Taylor in the leading roles, appear in the reel, and no expense has been spared by the producers to "dress" players and stage accurately, every detail being handled by men conversant with Shakespeare and the art of properly presenting his plays. The result is said to be a picture that will live long in the memory of all who see it. Various of the outdoor scenes are declared veritable scenic gems, and the reel as a whole will likely be received with open arms by the better class of shows.

FOUND—AN INDIVIDUAL WITH AN OVERBURDEN OF PANTOMIMIC TALENT

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

In Pennsylvania, on the Susquehanna River, stands a mansion, practically deserted. Beautifully furnished in style reflecting the artistic tastes of the owner, it overlooks with sombre reflection, with regrets and memories flitting in ghost shadows about it, the banks of Pennsylvania's most picturesque river.

Not long ago I stumbled, in this city of millions, upon the spirit which had flitted out into the world and away from the stagnant beauty—away from the chains of circumstance and convention which for years had hampered it—from the iron mask which smothered the flame of genius smouldering there. The name of the individual is Mrs. Nana Wyle. Mrs. Wyle, I found upon drawing her out, had wonderful talent for pantomimic work. Upon learning this I requested an exhibition of her work, which was pleasantly granted me. Running nimbly out of the room she returned in a very few minutes with a few articles of clothing thrown across her arm, consisting of a man's coat, a soft sombrero hat, a turkey red sash, a black cloak, and a few yards of white material. I looked askance. "I do it all with these and this," at the same time holding out for my inspection a little wisp of her own hair, which with the aid of a bit of wire she twisted into moustachios of different cuts, suited to the different characters which she impersonated.

MRS. NANA WYLE

The transformations are wonderful. In turn there stood before me the great Napoleon with his majestic frown, Rudyard Kipling, Mephisto, the Christ as painted by one of the great masters, Charles I. as represented in Vandyke's beautiful painting, Buffalo Bill ready to snap his six-shooter or throw his lasso. Besides these there was the impersonation of a decrepit old woman, a man on New Year's morning, after celebrating the incoming of the New Year, and others which have escaped my memory. During the exhibition her hair was let down over her shoulders or tucked neatly under a cap or hat as befitted the occasion.

The accompanying pictures show a few of the characters as impersonated by her. I was not able to procure just as many as I would have liked, nor the characters which I would most like to have shown you; however some idea of her work can be had from the accompanying illustrations.

In my interest in the advancement of the motion picture business, I was very glad to interview and bring before the notice of the producers and studio directors an individual of so unique a type, who, if it were necessary, could save the company money by being able to impersonate individuals of either sex, and, if any of the managers or directors who are interested would drop me a line in the M. N. P. office I would be very glad to arrange a meeting, and an exhibition of her work for them.

Mrs. Wyle is of French descent, and is particularly gifted in artistic and dramatic work, and is also excellent in comedy roles. She is at home on horseback, and in the role of a French cavalier she is unsurpassed. Her temperament I found was artistic to a fault. Of art and the beauties of nature she is an ardent admirer, and in the case of music proves an excellent and appreciative listener, and though she does not know one note from another has the rare faculty of accurately discovering pitch.

Only in rare cases do we run across such a diversity of talent running rampant. It is interesting to note what nature does for some, while others she seems to have forgotten or left for the next reincarnation. Too often the flame of genius is stifled out, or left to sob itself to sleep. Too often the inadequate are found filling the positions where the adequate should be.

LUCKY ESCAPE FROM DROWNING

The sad death by drowning of Albert Breyton has hardly been received when news of a similar accident, although this time there was a lucky escape.

The opening scene of the Solax Company's release entitled "A Gay Bachelor," release of August 23d, takes place at the beach where the bachelor, played by Gladden James, is enamored of a gay summer girl in an up-to-date bathing suit. During the rehearsals of the scene no one noticed the tide was rising quickly. Mr. James, unsuspectingly, was leaning back in his chair close to the edge of a small wharf. The play was on, the camera began to click, and Mr. James became lost in admiring a beautiful pair of silk stockings. At the critical moment James jumps up and trips on his chair, and before anyone realized it, fell headlong into the water. Stunned by the fall and not being able to swim, he bid fair to follow the unfortunate Breyton. Strong arms, however, came to the rescue and all had a good laugh.

Managing Director Melville hurried home to develop and look at his film. He says it was the most realistic piece of acting he has ever seen. As the accident was averted the Solax Company have decided to release the film as originally intended on August 23d.

By G. F. Blaisdell

The Fort Worth (Texas) Federation of Women's Clubs is the latest organization to declare for an independent censorship. They are very (very) busy these days, these splendid, self-sacrificing women of the border. Perhaps, after all, there may be consolation in this fact, for who shall say in what direction their benevolent activities might have turned had they not bethought themselves of the poor, undefended Moving Picture! Bear in mind this organization is not from or of Boston, nor yet even from or of the environs of that scholarly and historic town; and, it may be said in passing, the Hub seems satisfied with pictures as they are. This last outburst comes from what has been looked upon by some as the Wild and Woolly, and is said to be directed against sensational elopement scenes, murders and Indian depredations. The federation plans to prevent the production of any films it finds objectionable and announces that it does not intend that the rules which govern picture shows in other cities shall govern Fort Worth.

Very nice and exceedingly ladylike. When each municipality shall have established its own code of picture morals the troubles of the exchange man may be enough to induce him to shut up shop and go a-fishing.

In the meantime the National Board of Censorship is busy sawing wood and doing good, earnest work. Its judgment may not be infallible, but certainly in make up—in the character, experience and tolerance of its members—it is far and away ahead of its scattered critics.

The Rev. Charles Stelzle, superintendent of the Presbyterian Department of Church and Labor, has made good use of moving pictures in the Labor Temple, formerly the Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church. Through a shift in population the church membership was finally strained to the breaking point. The structure was rented to Mr. Stelzle for $10,000 a year, a fair price, with the understanding that if in two years he "made good" the structure would be turned over to him for his work. Mr. Stelzle has made good. He has founded a workingman's church, and he has built it up along original lines. He holds sometimes thirty-five services a week.

Mr. Stelzle's childhood was passed on the East Side of New York, and into it was crowded an experience such as perhaps can be gained in no other section of this country. He had first-hand knowledge of the horrors of the sweat-shop. When he went to work he learned the machinist's trade, and still caries his union working card. From the bench he entered the Presbyterian ministry, and has won the respect and affection of the toilers, organized and unorganized leaders and followers. In an interview recently he said:

"I have been harshly criticised for having the moving pictures in the Labor Temple. They are all clean pictures, of a religious or instructive type. They are the means of getting people interested in the other activities of my church. The value in motion pictures to the church is not yet recognized. As a means of teaching the truth graphically there is nothing to beat them. Our moto is 'The Labor Temple believes in the workingman. It also believes in the church. Can the workingman and the church co-operate? Come and see!'"

All races and creeds attend Mr. Stelzle's services.

In talking recently with one of the leaders of the National Board of Censorship the question of advertising posters was brought up. "Do you know," said the censor, "I think much adverse criticism on the part of those who do not have an intimate acquaintance with motion pictures might be avoided if some of the manufacturers used a little more discretion in the selection of the particular scene by which they feature and call attention to their product. It often happens that a still picture of one incident in a play, entirely separated from the scenes preceding and following it, gives an entirely false impression of the whole story.

"Now, for instance, let us take Nestor's film, 'The Settler's Wife,' which we have just seen. It is a strong piece of work, and may be the means of restraining and deterring hundreds of potentially erring wives from taking a false step. Its unmistakable lesson is driven home in a manner that will make all beholders think, and think hard. Yet there necessarily are one or two scenes here which, taken apart from the others, might create an entirely erroneous opinion of a really valuable work."

Alexander McLean of Toronto was fined $50 by a police magistrate for exhibiting pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight. On appeal, Judge Morson has set aside the conviction. The final decision released the films, which had been seized on their first projection. This was important to McLean, as he was under a bond of $10,000 for the return of the reels in good order.

The committee of Chattanoogans having in charge the taking of pictures showing Chattanooga and the surrounding country insist that the films turned in by the commercial concern that did the work will have to be improved in several respects before they will be accepted.

The Chicago Journal says that the number of "legitimate" actors applying for positions at the motion picture studios in the city by the lake is greater than ever. One leading woman of a Chicago company is quoted as follows:

"Give me the moving pictures. We have plenty of light, fresh air and exercise, every comfort and get well paid every week. That's a good deal better than working for some struggling stock company, learning and rehearsing new roles every week, dressing in a dark, dingy room and losing on the salary ofttimes."

The National Moving Picture Advertising Company has been chartered in Delaware to engage in the business of manufacturing and exhibiting pictorial slides and doing outdoor advertising. The company is capitalized at $125,000.

The National Film Distributing Company has also been chartered in Delaware, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, to purchase and lease, own or manufacture moving picture equipments.

The recent dynamiting in Great South Bay of the ancient schooner Robert Graham received a great deal of attention from the metropolitan press. Four cameras recorded the details of the marine disaster, and it is said the product will be entitled "The Two Friends." The estimate of $2,000 expended on the dynamiting scene and $3,000 on the twenty-four other scenes probably reflects no discredit on the industry of the press agent.

In the taking of moving pictures there are sometimes unexpected and, to the unconcerned spectators, humorous situations. A Bergen Point (N. J.) lawyer, returning to his office from his midday luncheon, found his sanctum in an uproar. In his absence a clerk had permitted the mock-marriage of an alleged eloping couple. The parties to the ceremony were about ready to make their escape as the lawyer broke in. To his commands to "Get out!" no one paid the slightest attention—with the exception of the actor-policeman, who mistook him for a member of the company and treated him somewhat harshly. As the elopers rushed for a waiting train they were followed by the stage parent and the lawyer. Real police were inextricably mixed with the actor article. The stage "cops" met every motion of the lawyer with a stay of proceedings. The director is said to have lost his voice reiterating "Great!"

The troubles of Samuel Denton of Flatbush (Flatbush is a part of Brooklyn) have been treated in a humorous manner by some of the unfeeling reporters. But it was in no mellow if melting mood in which Mr. Denton recently appealed to the magistrate of the Flatbush court. He was present in response to a summons obtained by Mrs. Denton, who charged her husband with brutality toward their son. Mr. Denton is small. Mrs. Denton is about two hundred pounds in weight and very muscular. Mr. Denton ascribed the family woes to the moving pictures, which are faithfully followed, even at home, by the other members of his household. He complained that his meals were neglected, that he was made to bear the brunt of the attempts of the family to duplicate the funny things they saw on the screen, and charged that his wife had arranged an elopement for their daughter. "Ethel came home a few days later and has been living with us ever since," said Mr. Denton. "I do not know what the man's name is, much less what he looks like or where he is."

The defendant also alleged that a coal scuttle had collided with his head, with all the impact imparted by 200 pounds. He also showed the magistrate a scar which he said was the result of an application of a smoothing iron.

The climax came, Mr. Denton alleged, when his better and larger half conspired with the husky son to inveigle him into a boxing match. The worm turned. Mr. Denton, when it comes to the manly art, modestly confeses that he is right there with the wallop. The boy took the count.

"If it is as you say," said the magistrate, "you have all the sympathy of the court."

OUR LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT

A meeting of the local motion picture men who belong to the Southern California Motion Picture Men's Association will be held next Wednesday. Mr. Nixon will probably hand in his resignation as president of the organization. The last two meetings were not called because it was understood that there would not be more than four or five members present, a condition which has existed for probably the past month.

The local motion picture exhibitors have won their fight on the new ordinance, which has just passed the city council. In the original draft, the motion picture men were placed under the jurisdiction of the police commission, and, therefore, in the power of the police. It declared that all moving picture theaters should be operated under permits granted by the police commission, which also would have the power to revoke such permits. The moving picture men strongly opposed this measure and after a hard fight had it eliminated. The ordinance as passed a few days ago provides for a board of censors or an advisory committee. This is to consist of five members, one each to be appointed by the mayor, police commission, board of education, Los Angeles Civic Association and the moving picture men's organization. This board will inspect and pass upon all motion picture films before they are shown.

The suffragettes in this city recently held a meeting for the purpose of advancing their ideas. The method finally decided upon was that motion picture films should be made showing the suffrage cause in the best light. The idea was advanced that this was the best way in which thousands of people might be instructed who otherwise never would hear of the suffrage cause.

For the first time in the history of motion pictures, this city will have a church exhibiting animated pictures. A permit was issued a few days ago to the Salem Congregational Church on East 28th street to install moving picture apparatus. The pictures will be shown next Sunday night. The plan was first suggested by members of the Baraca Class, who will have charge of the service. Three pictures will be shown, including "Easter Babies," "Gorges of Tarn" and "Athalah, Queen of Judea." An illustrated song entitled "Don't Forget to Drop a Line to Mother" will be sung by one of the members of the choir. These entertainments will continue each Sunday and Thursday night during the summer. The pictures selected for all of the services will be both scenic and educational. No pictures will be shown that will not be in keeping with the spirit of the occasion.

The California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company recently took pictures of the wreck of the large steamship, the Sant Rosa, which was wrecked off the coast of Santa Barbara while on the way from San Francisco to Los Angeles. Some excellent scenes were obtained of the large crowds which had gathered to view the wreck and some good pictures were obtained of the ship itself which had broken in two parts.

The Kalem Company will leave for the ocean side within a few days. Permission of the owner of the O'Neil ranch which covers about 320,000 acres has been obtained to take pictures. A few rural pictures will be made.

Dissatisfaction has appeared in the ranks of the members of the Motion Picture Men's Association. President Nixon has threatened to resign, it is said, and the place of meeting has been changed from the Shell Theater building to Hyman's Theater.

The number of exhibitors at meetings have dropped until at present there are only three or four members which attend. Last week's meeting was not called because enough members would not attnd. When meetings are called the members talk most of the time without doing anything, or if they do pass a resolution there is no one to see that it is enforced. The members realize this, and have become dissatisfied. Each one looks to the other to do something, and when it is done there is always some one to protest. A great many of the exhibitors declare that they can't waste their time attending meetings where there is a great deal of talk and nothing done.

The meetings would probably have been stopped long ago if it had not been for Mr. Stutz, of the Shell Theater, who has tried to arouse interest in the exhibitors of this city. Time and again he has visited the members of the association and pleaded and argued with them. Of course, he usually gets the exhibitor's promise to attend the next meeting, but when the time comes the exhibitor will probably plead that he has no time or has to be somewhere else. An instance of Mr. Stutz's work is that of making the Ideal Theater remove their fake picture of the Coronation of King George V.

When Mr. Stutz heard of the Ideal Theater substituting the Funeral of King Edward VIII for the Coronation pictures, he immediately—although the same proposition had been made to him and he had refused—formed a committee of motion picture men who were looking out for the best interests of the business and visited the owner of the Ideal. Five minutes later the picture was taken out of the bill, and in a half an hour later the film had been taken off the selling list of the exchange which had furnished it to the exhibitor. If the association had a few more men like Stutz, Nixon, Lustig, Kaiser and Hyman, there would probably be no talk now of disbanding.

The Empress Theater, which is owned by Sullivan and Considine, has changed its make of pictures, and are now showing those supplied by the Independent companies. Miles Brothers is the exchange chosen to supply them with reels.

Those few motion picture exhibitors who are interested in keeping the control of their places out of the clutches of the police department, succeeded in having the legislative committee of the city council cut out that section of the proposed ordinnace for governing moving picture theaters which declares that permits will be granted by the board of police commissioners. The city council will probably take the matter up again some time this week.

K. Oku and S. Hamada, proprietors of the Japanese-American moving picture theater, on First Street, near Wilmington Street, were given a suspended sentence of $10 or ten days in jail, Wednesday afternoon, for displaying advertising signs which depicted crime. The arrests were made by Policewoman Alice S. Wells. One poster pictured two Japanese swordsmen engaged in a duel. The other also presented a sword duel, and was a picture referring to the Spanish inquisition.

The Rounder, Main, near Fifth, has been painted a bright crimson in order to attract the attention of passers-by. The theater, which is on the Hyman circuit, has proved a financial failure so far.

A new theater, to be known as the Banner, is opening on Main, near Fifth, opposite Clunes. It will occupy the same place the Family did. The interior and exterior is being remodeled.

The Coronation picture is being exhibited at Clunes' Broadway Theater. The house has never had an empty seat since they started showing the picture.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington, D. C.

Manager Davis of the Georgetown Open Air theatre had a unique feature under the title of "The City of Yesterday" in connection with his motion pictures. This is the invention or idea of Prof. H. Armond, who with rare ingenuity reproduces electrically the San Francisco earthquake and the destruction of that city by fire. The cloud effects with their movements are both beautiful and impressive, while the burning of the city, the collapse of buildings and the attending noises are quite realistic. During this exhibition Prof. Armond makes some explanatory remarks, which add to the full appreciation of "The City of Yesterday." Manager Davis was most fortunate in securing this attraction on its first visit to the National capital. Its reception was most hearty and it is just such features that make a splendid combination with motion pictures. It would be well if there were more such ingenious men as Prof. Armond to give the public more of such electrical productions of world events.

A few words should be said about Manager Davis's open air theatre. It is a large covered park with a seating capacity of 1,000, so constructed as to admit of an abundance of air, while omitting the uncomfortable dampness so frequent on summer nights. Further cooled by fans, sufficiently lighted, and equipped with a large stage and conveniences for artists and patrons, it is unlike any other open air theatres in the city.

Another picture resort under the management of Mr. Davis is the City Picture Park, which indeed has the heavens for its dome. This is artistically and commodiously equipped and therefore finds ready patronage. Mr. Davis has an able assistant in his wife, who is always in attendance at one or the other of these parks, and perhaps makes almost as good a financial manager as her husband. When cool weather returns, Manager Davis will reopen his M Street theatre, which has been closed during the summer.

The Biograph people are reported making some views in and about Washington, which will shortly appear on the screens.

The weekly full page advertisement, which the Moore Amusement Company is using is a decided departure in the motion picture business, which usually depends upon its posters for calling the attention of the public. There are several of the houses who advertise in the local papers, but nothing has as yet equalled the vast outlay of Tom Moore. Statements from outside cities claim that Mr. Moore stands alone in his scheme, which of itself is a boon for the motion picture industry, particularly for the Independents, whose goods are hereby popularized.

The recent showing of the Merchant of Venice at the Virginia with a lecture by Theodore Hardy made quite a feature. Mr. Hardy is a member of the Columbia Players Company, now offering excellent dramas at the Columbia Theatre. He recently made a hit in "A Texas Steer."

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., July 26.—The past week has been rather quiet so far as the moving picture industry is concerned, for the picture men and the city have amicably settled the financial and legal difference that existed between them regarding the payment of their annual license, with honors going to the city, things moved along "in the peaceful tenor of their way."

The movement that was started to organize a branch of the Theatrical Stage Employees Association has, I understand, been successful, and some of the operators informed me this week that their charter had arrived. All that remains to complete the organization is for one of the officers with proper authority to come to this city and get the bunch together and put the Hot Springs local on its feet; and then we shall see what we shall see, for the question of the managers' meeting, the rules and regulations and obeying the schedule as outlined in that organization will be put up to the managers. I understand that the salaries run anywhere from $18 to $20 a week, with $10 for a helper. I may be mistaken in this, but that, I am sure, is the way it was given me, and if it is there is likely to be heard a protest from the managers at paying these figures, especially during the heated summer term, at which time business takes a slump. Then, too, the managers have not the advantage of the Sunday business, which has been denied them, and when the houses are closed Sunday it just takes that much off the receipts. One manager figures that he is out just about $5,000 a year by this operation, and it's a bad time to spring an advance in salaries on anyone in any business when the hot spell hits town. And when it hits hot in this burg—well, you are "frazzled,' and then some.

A very neat arrangement has been perfected by Patrick Gillam, operator at the Lyric, who, with his lamp, is able to throw the same slide that he uses in the theater out on the pavement, so that those who are passing may read. The second show there is always a large crowd outside the house waiting to get in, and Pat keeps them amused with appropriate slides, such as:

"Hear that laugh? Well, the show is great"; "Just a few minutes longer and we'll let you in"; "When you see this show you'll be glad you waited"; together with a lot of other up-to-the-minute slides. Pat, be it understood, is a mighty capable slide maker, as well as knowing all about picture machines, and the novel maner in which he has advertised the shows and pictures has boosted the interest and business at the house. The proprietor of the Lyric, Harry Hale, also demonstrated this week when in Chicago that he was a "live one," for while attending the convention of the managers of the Lyric circuit a scrap arose between two managers from Texas who wanted the next convention. Harry waited until it grew red hot and then, as compromise, put in a bid for Hot Springs. Of course, gentlemen, they jumped at it, for who doesn't want to come to this pretty resort, and the result was that the next meeting of the Lyric managers will be held in this city in January. There are about 200 delegates to this convention, consisting of the leading theatrical men of the country.

Doc Owens, manager of Whittington Park, helped entertain the members of the Arkansas Press Association, consisting of the prominent editors of the state who were making their annual tour of the commonwealth and stopped over in this city during the week. The "pencil pushers" had a great time while here and, though the visit was short, they enjoyed everything they saw, especially the attractions at Whittington Park.

Called on Lionel Lawrence, the star of the National Stock Company, playing a two weeks' engagement at the Airdrome Theater an evening or two ago, and while ploughing through his trunk he showed me a copy of the affidavit he made before the grand jury in New York, immediately following the Thaw-White tragedy. He was one of the first to reach Thaw after the shooting. Also, Lawrence was the first stage manager Evelyn Nesbit ever had. He was directing the stage for the "Wild Rose" company when she made her debut in the chorus.

It was not my good fortune to attend the picture shows daily this week, owing to a press of outside news of importance, including a shooting affray, but I managed to look over some excellent pictures, among them being one Ambrosia sent in, "Marine Scenes in Naples." Imp's "Gasoline Engagement" and "The Class Reunion" were also well received, as was "Mutt and Jeff." There are some minor defects in make-up in the reels, but they served their main purpose. Thanhouser also sent in two good reels, "When a Man Fears" and "Won by Wireless," and Reliance put across a winner in "Thou Shalt Not Lie."

The only trust picture I saw—for my time was brief—was the Melies reel, "When the Tables Turned," and it was all that could be desired. Miss Storey did some exceptionally fine work in that picture and the scene where she is picked up off the ground while the horses were going at full speed was indeed most picturesque and thrilling.

The Lyceum has installed two motors for their machines and the operators there are giving their arms a much needed rest. The Princess also has a motor for its machine and the Photo Play and Scenic will, I think, follow suit. What's that you said about a state law against it? Oh, forget it—it's too hot to look that question up, anyway.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

Editor The Moving Picture News,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Saunders:

I little thought when, two weeks ago, I suggested little stories from the ladies and gentlemen now before the camera that you would "call my hand," as they say in polite card parties, and ask me to lead the list.

This is, therefore, not to be a "moving picture story," but a little incident I shall always remember, owing to its absurd features.

Some years ago while a member of a prominent stock company playing at one of the Canadian parks a request was made of the management to produce the old and time-worn drama, "East Lynne." There was a convention of a well-known woman's organization meeting in the town and the local delegates wanted to give a theater party Saturday night, and it was on that night that they requested the English drama to be played; also it marked the close of our summer engagement at the park.

There was a howl of protest from the company when the communication from the ladies was received, as we had fought strenuously from producing that "chestnut," as the comedian termed it, all season.

"I guess we'd better play it, anyway," said the manager. "There are several hundred delegates attending the convention and they want it and that means that many seats sold, for I will shoot the prices on 'em, being it's a special production. Every one of you is 'up in the play' and you can get together and throw it into shape with one rehearsal. Besides, it's the last night we're here, so don't kill yourselves."

We had two rehearsals on the bill, most of the company having at various times played many of the characters. We forgot, however, in the excitement of the production, "Little Willie," and Saturday came and there was no youngster for me, playing "Lady Isabel," to cry over.

The stage manager of the theater came forward and saved the day, saying his son would play that part, as he had often been used to impersonate characters in child's parts. The director of the company told him to bring him around and said that he would cut out all the speaking lines except those in the death scene.

We didn't see the youngster until a few minutes before the first act. Will I ever forget him? Short and fat, with a wealth of tangled hair as red as anything in the "Railroad Builder" or "Flames and Fortune," and with a voice that would have done credit to a bass singer or a fish peddler. I quickly told him what was wanted, and so many recognized him when he first appeared that he got a "reception," bless his stubborn little heart.

The death scene came and I discovered "me cheeild" on the bed, one foot on top of another, monument like. I told him to take his feet down, but he wouldn't listen, so I went on with the scene. Before that I had noticed the company standing in the wings, smiling and I wondered what they were up to. I cut the scene when I suspected they had coached the boy, and when I called upon "Willie" to speak to me I was startled to see the stage manager walk on the stage. He was playing "Dill." He said to "Willie":

"You don't know this yer female woman, do you, kid?"

"NAW, I DON'T KNOW YOU—GIT OUT," yelled "my darling."

"All right, if that's the case we'll 'ring down,'" declared the stage manager, his back to the audience, laughing. And down came the curtain.

Of course, it was a "frame up," and, being the stage manager, the man had taken it upon himself to do that which he would not have thought for a moment of doing on any but the closing night. Strange to say, no one in the audience was aware of the true state of affairs.

Now, let's have a moving picture story from some one before the camera. THE LADY IN THE BATHS.

OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT

London Office of the News, 8 Sherwood St., W.

And the hot spell is upon us, though not of such severity as that which the papers tell us the United States is enjoying. Enquiries at several of the leading theaters show business to be keeping up surprisingly. The Coronation pictures have helped, but I doubt if they have proved such an all compelling draw as those of the funeral of the late King Edward. For one thing the show was not one which appealed so much to the sentiment of the people; it contained no such incident as the leading of the dead King's dog (a masterstroke of showmanship even for the surpassing showmen who control these affairs). These remarks hardly, however, apply to the Scala's "Kinemacolor" picture of the event, every seat in that house being booked up to Thursday last, before the picture was included in the program. The "Scala" is undoubtedly an assured success, a result all the more gratifying in that nearly everybody prophesied disaster to the venture, in view of Scala's continued run of bad luck.

Waltindaw's had two Coronation films of 1,000 feet on show in two Birmingham shows at 3.25 on the actual day of the procession. That's good moving and shows that we are not altogether asleep in this country. Work as quick, or nearly so, was done by several other of the firms who filmed the Coronation.

Is there anything in the rumor to be met with in the trade as to trouble between a certain American film manufacturing concern and the firm who once represented them in this country, I wonder? Certainly there's no love lost in the quarters indicated, but I shall believe in legal action being taken when the case is actually in the list. B. A.

AMERICAN FILM CO.

The Flying A aggregation of moving picture artists and artisans locating in El Cajon Valley, now numbering over thirty individuals, is unquestionably one of the happiest and most contented lot of moving picture people in the United States. They are all extremely enthusiastic over the wonderful climatic conditions existing in their new environment. To understand this feeling it is only necessary to mention that there is never a greater variation in temperature in El Cajon Valley than twenty degrees. The temperature continually varies between seventy and ninety degrees Fahrenheit.

While the exhibitors in the Central States, in fact over the entire Eastern portion of the United States, during the last three or four weeks, have been sweltering, fussing, and cursing the thermometer registering from one hundred to five hundred degrees in the shade, the American Company in El Cajon Valley have been making pictures with a vim and gusto that puts to shame the muchly disproved belief that Southern California is a hot country. The results of this enthusiasm and superabundant health and satisfaction, on the part of our Western company, is apparent in the forthcoming productions of the Flying A product. They are masterpieces each and every one of them.

KINEMACOLOR

During the week the Kinemacolor Company have received the most marvelous set of pictures ever taken in the world's history of photography.

These pictures were taken by Royal Command of King George V. and copies of them will be deposited in the sanctuary of the Tower of London, going to make up a part of the historical archives of the British Government for future historical ages.

These pictures absolutely beggar description. Such a kaleidoscopic array of colors has probably never been witnessed in so short a space as was seen during the forty days of Coronation festivities, commemorating the crowning of King George V. as ruler of the British Empire.

Amongst the pictures that may be mentioned are: "Trooping the Colors," "Empire Day," "Unveiling of Queen Victoria's Memorial," "The Embarkation of the Canadian Mounted Police," "The Disembarking at Liverpool," "The Camp at Hyde Park," "The East Indian Contingent in Camp at Hampton Court," "Natural London," "London Disguised," "The Naval Review at Spithead," "Peers and Peeresses Embarking on the Thames Steamboat at Chelsea," "The Royal Procession," covering over 6,000 feet of film, showing King George and Queen Mary at very close range, and the returning of the regalia worn at the Coronation by the King to the Lord Mayor of London.

It may not be generally understood that the Regalia and jewels worn by the King and Queen are of inestimable value. A number of the world's precious stone experts have tried to estimate the value of this regalia and have signally failed. The world's most famous precious stones are in this collection and their value is practically priceless.

The Naval Review at Spithead presents a water panorama beyond the ability for any human description to put into words. With her pennant proudly floating and the dear old Star and Bars floating on the breeze is the "Delaware," the pride of our navy.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

By L. W. D.

I.—A Plea For Personality in Motion Picture Production

When photography is merely the work of the sun and the camera, completed by the introduction of chemistry, it cannot possibly be termed an "art," but beyond this, to the photographic artist, it can give effect to the imagination and in the retention and treatment of a subject the photographer may exercise complete control and may produce a picture more or less artistically correct in accordance with the degree of his own skill. Although he may be discouraged by the fact that he is compelled to rely on mechanical aids for the representation of the personal feeling, he should bear in mind that frequently the instrument succeeds where the hand fails in rendering accuracy. Briefly, although one might use the camera intelligently, develop the negative and make a print, the result is bound to be a poor one unless a certain amount of artistic and scientific knowledge is brought to bear upon the work. In the early days of photography the composition and lighting of a picture came under the heading of "Art" and other things under that of "Science." To-day the phrase "Art—Science" is practically obsolete. The educated photographer may generally be regarded as a cultured craftsman—his work being the manifestation of craftsmanship, and to a knowledge of artistic principles he adds that of the possibilities of his lens, films and printing and developing processes.

The Evolution of the Art Photographer

The modern photographer has only attained that state of development and craftsmanship after a long apprenticeship. Trace the successful photographer of to-day back to his primality and one will find that in the majority of instances he was a "square peg in a round hole." He knew practically nothing of the art and technique of his subject, so failure, perseverance and experience have rounded off the sharp edges of the peg so that it ultimately fitted the hole, and thus out of chaos and incompetency has been evolved a "finished" craftsman.

Many are the instances of photographers who were originally dark-room assistants, doormen, etc., but now, having gone through the mill, they have become competent picture-makers. An exactly similar state of affairs is happening in

The Motion Picture Field of To-Day

It is agreed that the making of motion pictures from the time the handle of the camera whirred to the time when the finished positive is ready for exhibition is by no means simple. We regret that so much of it perforce must be entrusted to partially incompetent hands simply for the reason that high-class expert work is not a drug on the market. The motion picture field is not overcrowded with good operators and producers. These "square pegs" must adapt themselves to the needs of the case before the best possibilities of the motion picture world; therefore the incompetent—the "square peg"—must be abolished or they must adapt themselves to modern requirements.

In the early days of the industry the workers' interest was solely centered on the camera's ability to record facts; nowadays we have the individual impression of that fact recorded and fully expressed in the picture-photograph through the infusion of personal motive.

Every art or craft in the world that is fit to rank as such is capable of ennoblement by thought, feeling and expression, so that even in the most elementary forms of his art the producer who possesses an artistic personality can infuse an artistic style into his work which will be at once distinguishable from mere efficiency in technical treatment. This is no exaggeration; we have quite sufficient material in photography to produce at the very least a work of art in monochrome and thus justify all that has been written of its artistic capabilities and extracted by the newest manufacturers.

Photograph making is comparatively simple. Picture making that will pass rigid criticism in the way of composition, lighting, etc.—the technique of the subject—is extremely difficult and can only be accomplished by the scientific method as opposed to mere guesswork. We are aware of the difficulties of the picture makers—we have watched their work; we know of the heartbreaking failures which never see the light of publicity; of the errors in exposure, development, in printing; of the pathetic work of film; the pointless stories; the misedited plots and of "releases" not released. We are fully aware of all this and that is why we write in this strain—out of sympathy for those manufacturers who are striving against the ignorance of those upon whom a restricted market forces them to rely. Only the best can hope to succeed—only the best is wanted in the motion picture field.

II.—Potentialities of the Picture Theater

A demonstration of picture-telegraphy combined with cinematography has recently been given by a French scientist, by means of varying currents illuminating the picture and reproducing it at the receiving end. However, the invention is still in the embryonic stage, but it is confidently expected that ere long films will be transmitted over long distances by means of telegraph or cablegraph. It is accordingly possible that people living in New York will at no far distant date be able to witness in the evening in a picture theater the representation of a notable event that took place in Pekin, Tokio, or some place equally distant, the same day. Of course, the time is not yet. It was only quite recently that the possibility of utilizing the telegraph for other purposes than that of conveying "messages" was demonstrated, and the process of "wiring" pictures is not yet perfected, although the experiments which have been conducted in England, in which I have taken part, indicate that success is merely a matter of time.

Meanwhile, those who cater for the supply of films appear to be exerting themselves in every direction, pending the advent of the telegraphic-cinematographic era, in providing "topical" subjects with as much dispatch as possible. The picture theater is rapidly becoming a mirror of the age; it will very shortly, in the opinion of the writer, be evolved into the world's newspaper, presenting facts, not by means of columns of type, but by the much more effective method of pictures. The picture, it must be remembered, is the universal language. The most eloquent passage in English conveys nothing but sounds to the average truckman, and vice versa; while the picture conveys the same meaning to every human being, whatever his race or dialect. But few of the multitude of picture theater patrons pause to consider its potentialities. In certain directions a process of evolution will certainly have to be undergone. The comic element is far too much in evidence. We would not advocate the suppression of humor, or a representation of the humorous aspects of life—far from it. The man or woman who has no sense of humor spends a very dreary existence. But humor has its proper place, and is prone, too often, to border on vulgarity. We should have genuine fun minus vulgarity, and the comic element should not overshadow the remainder of the entertainment. Where, as is largely the case at the present, the comic pictures form the bulk of the programme it will be difficult to get the public to take the picture theater seriously, or to comprehend or contemplate the vast educational potentialities, to which this journal is repeatedly and justly referring.

When the invention of the French scientist has been perfected, and the happenings of the morning in China or Peru or Timbuctoo are depicted on the screen in West Fourteenth Street, the picture theater will have attained a very important position as an enlightening and educational force.

It is well for the future of cinematography that there are many workers in its interests who appreciate the opportunities that lie ready at hand for developing the picture theater and making it a great national institution, a source of education, instruction and enlightenment, as well as a highly profitable business.

A NOTABLE FILM!

If you, dear reader, heard of a woman sacrificing her life for her husband, you would be pretty certain that woman was a heroine. But if she sacrificed her life for a husband who had deceived her and been unfaithful to her, we think you would be pretty certain to say she was indeed a rare woman, and a true one. It is just this character that Rex has put into a picture-play, entitled "Her Way," and if her way was more in vogue both in our homes and in our film studios, things would be better all round.

We particularly advise all our readers to read the synopsis of this unusual picture in this issue, and if exhibitors will have enough faith in our criticism of the picture after an advance view at the Rex studio, they will just clamor for "Her Way." We don't want to give Rex any free advertising, but we do want to give the exhibitors a good tip. Rex pays for its regular advertising, of course, and does it in an up-to-date and live-style manner; but there can be no such thing as too much talking about a picture with the merits of "Her Way."

The acting is more than commendable—it establishes a new school of dramatic expression. The scenic effects are a tribute to the inventive ingenuity of the Rex producer, and the story itself a eulogy of the Rex scenario department. The sacrifice of the woman is thrilling. Mr. Smalley and Human Interest play the leading part, and they co-operate so well as to make the picture wholly absorbing. Just to give our friends an idea of how we personally liked it, we asked them to run it over again for us, simply because we never tire of seeing good, forceful, realistic acting, and the picture is replete with this.

"Her Way" should show, once and finally, that the Rex way is the right way and that the influence and the strength they are exerting over the Independent program does carry some weight. More power to you, Rex! King of all film!

THOMAS BEDDING

We have received a communication asking us to notify our readers that the versatile Tommy has severed his connection with the Associated Motion Picture Patents Company for cause, and that he has allied himself with a Philadelphia manufacturer. We gladly give this publicity and also wish to inform our readers that the said T. B. was dismissed from the A. M. P. P. Co. some seven or eight weeks ago for incompetency. On interviewing Mr. A. W. Leggett, he informed us that he employed Thomas Bedding on his own recommendation as being capable of influencing a vast amount of business on a commission basis. Some of our English readers will recollect the fiasco when he tried to exploit Charles Urban Company—the same resulted here. We wonder if Carson has found he has a white elephant on his hands?

COLLEEN BAWN

Released by the Yankee Film Co., Monday, August 21

The English-speaking, theater-going public are well acquainted with this beautiful Irish tale made famous by song and story. Its first production in New York City was at the Laura Keene Theater, on March 27, 1860. Among the people who participated at that time were men and women whose names since that day have become famous in the theatrical world: Dion Boucicault, H. F. Daly, Laura Keene, Mme. Pnisi, and Josephine Henry are but a few of the many who are still lovingly remembered by the old-timers. The story is too well known to need repeating, for where can you find a man, woman, or child who does not know dear old Father Tom, Myles na-Copaleen, Hardress Creegan, Danny Mann, Eily O'Connor, Anne Chute, Sheelah, or any of the other well-beloved characters.

To produce this great play and do justice to it meant the outlay of enormous sums, but as expense was a minor detail, the result obtained is a fitting monument to perseverance and progressiveness displayed by the Yankee Film Co. Proper scenery and costumes of the period of 1792 were procured only by having them specially made, and then began the long journey to the beautiful Emerald Isle with a selected company of players, where the most magnificent scenery in the world was obtained.

After months of untiring labor, study and effort, the Yankee Film Co. have produced a masterpiece of which they may justly be proud. An effort has been made to adhere as closely as possible to the original play by Dion Boucicault and Laura Keene, and the result is a magnificent production that will recall pleasant memories to the old-timers and delight the eyes of all who see it.

COMING GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE FILM

A unique military film, entitled "A Traitor To His Country," is announced for release August 26th by the Great Northern Film Company.

This war drama, containing exceedingly thrilling and appealing romantic plots, will find particular favor owing to its exceptionally fine portrayal by actors from the Royal Theatre at Copenhagen who by their combined efforts have succeeded in attaining the perfection of realism in pictures.

It is quite a feather in the cap of the Great Northern people procuring the services of star performers of such calibre, as it is not an every-day occurrence among film producers. It brings the picture patrons in touch with genuine artists which means another step upward in the movement of elevating the motion picture industry.

Over and Over Again

You know the line from one of the song-hits of the day. OVER AND OVER AGAIN you will say that is a film that—well, you know pictures are more illustrative than word-paintings. You will have to see the picture to realize that it combines as extraordinary playing, plot and picture personality as only REX can put into a film. The traditional impecunious artist develops a bit of commercial strategy that captivates his unwillingly-prospective father-in-law, and that will captivate you and your audience.

"The Artist Financier"

will show you how to increase your box-office receipts.

A NEW SYSTEM OF CINE-PHONOGRAPHY

From "Projektion"

The usual method now adopted for the production of sound pictures involves the use of a cinematograph, a phonograph or a gramaphone, and some form of synchronizer, the sound record being both made and reproduced mechanically. This system cannot be said, however, to be absolutely perfect, though in many cases much has been accomplished by its means; in the best records yet obtained, so-called extra sounds are often noticeable, while the use of a synchronizer is also attended with difficulties. For these reasons, therefore, if for no others, the introduction of a totally new method of producing sound pictures cannot fail to be of some importance to all concerned in the picture theater industry. Various experimenters have from time to time endeavored to obtain a sound record mechanically on the surface of a film, the sound to be reproduced by methods analagous to those adopted with the phonograph or gramophone. These attempts have, however, not been attended with much success, and a method of dealing with the problem has now arisen which apparently offers certain advantages over other forms of sound machines at present known. The following description will give some idea of this invention. The recording instrument consists of a mechanism for the continuous transport of a narrow film, somewhat similar to that used for the production of pictures, the apparatus being in direct connection with a cine-camera. The film is enclosed in a light-tight case, one side of which carries a narrow slit, similar to that at the end of the collimator tube of a spectroscope. This slit is adjustable and is placed parallel to the plane of translation of the sensitized film. Hence, all actinic light falling through the slot will affect photographically the traversing strip and on development the deposit of silver will be proportionate to the actinic intensity of the light falling through the opening. Outside this slit, and in close approximation to it, is placed a right-angle prism, whose prismatic edges are parallel to the sides of the opening. This prism can move readily about an axis placed vertically through its right angle, but is rigid in all other directions. Outside this prism, and at an angle to a line passing through film, slot and prism, is placed a light. The rays from this, on passing through the prism are broken up into their component parts, and the light prism and film are so mutually adjusted that the violet and ultraviolet portions of the spectrum fall upon the sensitized film, such adjustment being obtained by the use of a fine micrometer screw attached to the prism. It may be mentioned that the light used for this purpose need only be that emanating from a filament lamp. To the prism is rigidly attached one end of a small rod, whose other extremity is also rigidly fixed to the centre of a tightly stretched membrane. The modus operandi is as follows: Any sound vibrations which impinges on this membrane or diaphragm set up a corresponding motion in the prism about its axis, which results in bringing about a variation in the actinic value of the rays which fall upon the surface of the film. That is to say, if the prism moves in one direction the emulsion will be more affected, and if in a contrary direction the photographic effect will be proportionately less. In the case of a film being in motion during a period of silence, a uniform black strip down the center of the strip would be the only development; but if, on the other hand, any vibration has been set up in the membrane the record will be a wavy band, consisting of alternate light and dark portions. In this manner, therefore, it is said, a photographic record could be obtained which would correspond accurately to certain sounds.

For the purpose of reproducing the original sound for such photographic records, a positive film is first of all made from the negative in the usual manner. This positive is caused to travel between two sprocket wheels with a continuous motion, and is in direct connection with, and actuated by, the driving mechanism of projector. Behind the sound film is placed a powerful light, and the light, passing through the film, is focused on to the surface of a selenium cell. It should be explained that selenium is a crystalline substance, which, mechanically, strongly resembles sulphur and phosphorus, and like these substances is a bad conductor of electricity. This substance, however, possesses a peculiar property, namely, its electrical resistance varies indirectly to the amount of light falling upon it. That is to say, the more light which falls upon a piece of selenium the more readily can an electrical current pass through it. In the cell above referred to, a certain exact amount of selenium is enclosed in a glass tube, which is protected from all extraneous light other than that which has passed through the sound record, and is arranged so as to form a portion of a telephone circuit. If light of a uniform strength be allowed to fall on this selenium cell, the resistance, it is claimed, will be lowered so that an appreciable amount of current can pass. This will only affect the telephone momentarily, as the action of this instrument depends upon fluctuations in current strength, and not on the passage of a uniform current.

"BY THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT."

Nursery rhymes furnish the theme for a recent noteworthy attempt on the part of the Imp Company "By the House That Jack Built." It is a story that will interest children and those of more mature years as well. There is a pretty plot having to do with the strange experiences of a bond girl, who is transported to fairyland by the old lady of Banbury Cross, and eventually marries the prince, the handsome son of Old King Cole. The story is elaborately staged, richly costumed and admirably acted, with a large cast and all the accessories to make it a complete and magnificent spectacle. There are a series of very pretty tableaux with beautiful setings—pomp and splendor with quaint situations. That it will prove one of the most successful films of the season goes without saying as no pains nor expense has been spared to make it complete in every detail. It is an innovation on the part of the Imp Company that will no doubt be appreciated.

"THE ARTIST FINANCIER"
Rex Release August 3d

Love will find a way, the old, old saying goes—and sometimes the way comes in the least expected manner.

Mr. Reynold sends for an artist from town to paint his daughter's portrait. He comes, he paints, he conquers. One day, as she is sitting for him, and he is translating on the canvas, with the aid of his colors, the beauty and the natural color of herself, Cupid enters the scene and paints a picture of his own—a picture of youth and love and springtime. The father sees the young people together just a bit too much, and divines the secret. He forbids the artist the house, and refuses to let his daughter see him.

A certain Mr. Bell, however, invented the telephone, and soon many ardent messages click over the wires. At a certain time each day she stands at a window, and he passes and gets a glimpse of his goddess. On one of these daily visits to the grounds, he sees a surveyor at work on the estate, and in passing glances through the surveyor's glass. Astonished, he sees the house as though he were looking through a field-glass. At once a happy thought occurs to him. He can arrange to have the girl stand on the porch at an appointed hour each day and with the aid of a surveyor's outfit, finish the uncompleted portrait. The next telephone conversation is a weighty one, details are arranged and thereafter daily, with glass and easel, he works on the long-distance portrait.

One day, however, Miss Reynold does not appear. Instead come her father and another, who point down the road and talk. The artist, through his deaf-mute sister, has mastered lip-reading, and can tell what they are saying by the movement of their lips. Reynold tells the other, apparently an engineer, that the railroad is to go along the lines pointed out by him, and must pass through Eagle Pass to get to the mountains. The artist suddenly exhibits a bit of commercial instinct that would do justice to the old financier himself. He goes to the farmers holding land at Eagle Pass, and buys an option on the land for a year. Then he just waits.

The expected result follows. Reynold goes to the farmers to arrange for the purchase of the land, and in every case is told that the young artist holds the option. Dumbfounded he wonders how it is that the artist just owns the very land he wants, but at last he is forced to go to him and make terms. The artist, remembering the unfairness of the other's treatment of himself, names a steep figure for the land and Reynold is forced to accept. Then the youth tells him how he came to learn the secret, and the financier, marveling at the newly discovered commercial ability possessed by the artist, tells him he has enough business tact and foresight to marry a financier's daughter, and that his business strategy will be an asset to the family. Thus endeth happily the romance of an artist-financier.

"KATHLEEN MAVOURNEEN"
Yankee Release August 7th

A young squire has fallen in love with the pretty daughter of one of his tenants. Unfortunately he has never been able to declare his love to the pretty Irish lass for lack of opportunity.

While visiting among his tenants with his sister they come to the home of the girl's parents and the young squire makes the best of this opportunity, declares his love and asks the pretty colleen to become his wife. Although flattered by the offer of the young squire, the lass hesitates about accepting, as she loves and is beloved by a handsome Irish lad of her village. Being undecided, she asks the squire for time and assures him of her answer on the morrow. The squire returns to his home and writes a note to the colleen, stating that he will call the following day for his answer.

As the girl is perusing the epistle and pondering over the dilemma she falls asleep.

She dreams that she has married the squire and that he has grown tired of her; he has even gone so far as to hire assassins to waylay and murder her. The timely arrival of her former sweetheart and his heroic battle with the hired assassins saves her from this violent death.

The young squire, meeting his wife and her former sweetheart, becomes insanely jealous. He is about to kill her, when her former sweetheart begins a desperate struggle and accidentally kills the young squire. Soldiers passing that way come upon the scene and place the Irish lad under arrest for the murder of the squire. The lad is condemned to death and the day is set for his execution. The girl then realizes how great her love is for the poor Irish lad and also that her marriage to the squire was a great mistake. She visits the lad in his cell on the last day and as he is led forth to the execution she falls in a faint.

She wakes from this horrible dream sobbing bitterly, and makes up her mind as to the proper answer to give to the squire. When the squire calls on the following day she introduces him to the Irish lad who has been her sweetheart for years and thanking the squire for the honor of his proposal, assures him that she would rather be the wife of the Irish lad whom she loves.

The squire takes his defeat manfully and makes the happy couple a substantial wedding present, sufficient to give them a start in life.

"GREY WOLF'S SQUAW"
Yankee Release August 11th

Grey Wolf, a young Indian brave, falls in love with the daughter of the chief of the Sioux tribe and after presenting the chief with horses and blankets he obtains the young Indian maid, Blue Bird, as his squaw.

Blue Bird is not pleased with her father's choice of a husband and at night, when Grey Wolf is asleep, she quietly steals away, taking with her the horses, and returns to her tribe. The crafty chief is pleased to see his daughter, as she may be the means of bringing him many more blankets and horses.

Grey Wolf, upon awakening, discovers his loss and determines to gain possession of his squaw as well as his horses. He appears before the chief and demands his property. The chief has him beaten and thrown from the camp. Smarting from the injustice, he appears at night when the entire camp is asleep, and stealing into the tent of Blue Bird, drags her forth and escapes in a canoe. While being pursued by other Indians in a canoe he gives battle and after overturning the canoe of his pursuers makes his way safely to his own tent.

Blue Bird cannot but admire the bravery of the man who bought her and seeing how he overcame every obstacle in order to obtain possession of her, she learns to love him and cheerfully accompanies him to his tent as his bride.

"THE OLD PEDDLER"
Imp Release August 7th

In which a Hebrew pack peddler distinguishes himself and rescues a small boy from the clutches of a gang of thugs who seek to kidnap the child.

Willie Strong is left at home with only a maid and his two collie dogs for company. The peddler calls and is refused admission to the house by the timid servant. Willie is interested in the wandering vendor and insists that he come in, when he purchases a pair of suspenders. Willie shows the peddler some photographs of himself and the former is immediately struck by the resemblance of the portraits to his child, who has recently died. He becomes interested in the boy and gives him his address and asks him to call on him. The promise is given and the old man departs.

Willie subsequently calls at the humble home of the peddler, and is made most welcome by him and his wife. The boy is given a toy and leaves, after being cautioned in regard to the way back home.

Willie is obliged to pass through a tough quarter of the town and stops to ask for directions at a low saloon. Two Italian thugs are drinking and quarreling, when they notice the boy and see that he is well dressed. They start out with the intention of kidnapping him and holding him for ransom. They come upon the boy asleep, being guarded by the dogs, and they conceal themselves and wait.

The peddler is apprehensive after the child leaves and decides to follow. He visits the saloon and discovers that the boy has been there and was followed, and he starts after the Italians.

In the meantime the parents of the boy have returned home and learning of the absence of the child, become alarmed. The servant is questioned and tells of the visit of the peddler. The dogs come home and try to tell the family in their language of the peril of Willie. Officers are summoned and, guided by the dogs, the searchers are conducted to the place where the dogs left the child asleep, but he is gone.

The thugs are found close by and they are arrested on suspicion of knowing the whereabouts of the missing boy. They deny all knowledge of an abduction, but turn suspicion on the old peddler, whom they are satisfied has spirited the boy away out of their clutches.

The old peddler has discovered Willie, and seeing his danger, places him in his pack after removing its contents, and he trudges along towards the home of the boy. The peddler is taken into custody, but proves to be a benefactor instead of a rogue by unstrapping his pack and producing the boy unharmed and happy.

"DOROTHY'S FAMILY"

Imp Release August 10th

Dorothy Meade is a handsome young woman who has a multiplicity of admirers and is inclined to mild flirtation. She goes for a visit to the house of a friend and becomes a favorite at once with the eligible young men, who find basking in her smiles a most delightful diversion.

The rivalry narrows down to two men, Bob Vernon and Raymond Morris, and she is unable to decide between them, being satisfied with either. The rivalry is quite bitter and also productive of much humor. They dog her footsteps and devise divers and sundry ways of making an impression. Dorothy enjoys the situation and it furnishes much amusement for her friends. There is an open breach between the men when Morris attempts to impress the girl with his vocal accomplishments in the way of singing sonnets to her beauty. Dorothy decides that the time has arrived to choose and, being a resourceful young woman, she sets about it to make a test that will be convincing.

Returning home, she writes her admirers to call at her home and become acquainted with her family, telling each one that she will give him the long-expected answer.

They hasten to her home town, each being ignorant of the misson of the other. Morris gains a lap on Vernon and charters an automobile and is whirled away. Vernon climbs on behind and the lovers are driven rapidly down the street.

In the meantime Dorothy has mapped out a plan of campaign. She rents the flat of a washerwoman and presses into service a half-dozen dirty, unkempt children, taking possession. Her uncle is coaxed to enter into the spirit of the occasion and he makes up as her brother. The arrangement is most complete and Morris arrives on the scene, is ushered into the untidy room and introduced to the motley gathering. Dorothy explains that it is her family. Morris takes one look and that is enough. He stammers out apologies and backs out, disgusted, his dream of love shattered.

In the meantime Vernon is on the ground and witnesses the tableau through the window. He is at first astonished but takes keen relish in witnessing the discomfiture of Morris. After Morris leaves the room Vernon sees Dorothy and her uncle hilarious over the success of the ruse and it dawns upon him that the scene has been arranged for a specific purpose. He gets the humor of it and laughs heartily.

Hastily arranging his tie, he enters the room and is greeted cordially by Dorothy and noisily by her supposed relatives. He has his cue and greets the urchins warmly, endures the painful handshake of the uncle, and explains he is happy to meet them all, genuinely so.

Dorothy sees his true worth and decides that she is loved for herself alone, and he takes her in his arms. Later, he is introduced to the relatives of Dorothy in her handsome apartments and pulls off the trick of being truly surprised. Of course they marry, and he has the laugh on Morris.

"DEWEY"

Champion Release August 7th

The wonderful achievements of George Dewey in defying mines and batteries to enter Manila Bay, there to annihilate the whole Spanish fleet at that station was the talk of the world; and the putting of such a hero, fittingly into a film story is well worth the commendable enterprise.

As we see here the illustrious Dewey in situations where his patriotism shines forth, we behold those truly transcendental qualities of his personality which made him great. But this picture is not merely a biographical projection, but deals with other factors and incidents of the Spanish War period.

Mark Hanna and Theodore Roosevelt play important roles in the story unfolded, which is remarkable not only for the personages it contains, but for the curious incidents which are interwoven. Into the weft and woof of historical fact, there is woven a beautiful color—a color of heart interest that grips us in an ever tightening embrace, and there are also patches of brightness in that color—humor, we may call it—bright, keen, unconscious Irish humor—that makes us realize how precious humor is, as an offset to the gripping intensity of the other situations.

The bursting of a mine in the path of the Irish despatch bearer in his great death ride through the enemy's lines may be mentioned as one of these tense moments to which we have reference.

Either as to subject, historical incident, or manner of presentation, no American film in years can come up to this film picture of the renowned George Dewey.

"CHIEF FIRE EYE'S GAME"

Champion Release August 9th

Gerald wasn't a bad sort by any means. He was a big, handsome fellow and liked by everyone. There wasn't a cowpuncher for miles around who would not go through fire and water for him; but whenever Gerald had any fire-water in him, he would do as he pleased, and allow no one to help him. At such a time, he was gambling with a couple of greasers, and they were raking in pot after pot, and Gerald's load of "peaches" was getting heavier. Nor would he stop at the behest of friends, and the game went on.

An old Indian Chief had become an interested spectator of the game as it progressed. His eyes glistened instinctively with the gambler's spirit. With ever increasing fascination he bent over Gerald's chair, watching the cards as they were played or dealt. In no pleasant mood, Gerald roughly pushed him aside. The chief took no umbrage at this, but on the contrary appealed to the man, thus delivering himself: "Me big chief; learn how to play; you teach me?"

But he only met with a rebuff and a blow, and when he unconsciously drew back in an attitude which bespoke resentment, a dozen guns were levelled at him and his companion. But Gerald interfered at this, and the bartender ejected the big chief. The latter laid his savage plans.

Shortly after, Gerald was cleaned out of all his cash; all the others in the saloon had departed, leaving him "alone in his glory"; and so it came about that he flung himself on a couch near the window and was soon snoring in a profound slumber. Back came the Indians, the chief with several others, and Gerald was kidnapped.

The discovery was soon made, and the cowboys being informed, dashed madly away in pursuit. The trail led them to the Indian camp and one of the boys climbed a tree. He saw them wildly dancing about their victim with fiendish gesticulations. But—what's this! The line of redskins opens, and there sits Gerald on a blanket with the big chief, teaching him how to play cards.

"CATTLE, GOLD AND OIL"

American Release August 7th

Will Harrington and his wife are making money on their ranch, but they are not satisfied and when they read of the gold strike at Twin Buttes, and the possibilities of great wealth, they determine to go and prospect for gold.

As is typical of all mining camps, the grafter is present at Twin Buttes, and Harrington and his wife fall victims to their wiles. Jim Barlow and Tom Hunter, finding the claim they have staked is worthless, proceed to salt it by shooting golddust over the rocks, and then inveigle Harrington to visit the claim and inspect it. The rich showing of ore is all that is necessary to consummate the sale and, turning over his savings to the grafters, Harrington and his wife become the owners of the salted claim.

Harrington returns to the hotel and tells his wife of his purchase and, taking a pick, they visit their claim together. Harrington breaks off a piece of rock that has the richest showing of ore and is surprised to find there is no gold inside. His wife tells him to take the sample to the assayer's office and she will wait for him at the claim. The assayer returns with him and, after a brief examination, he dashes their hopes by explaining that the claim is worthless and that they have been robbed.

Meeting the grafters on the street, Harrington demands restitution, but they laugh at him and coldly inform him that he has bought something. Investigation soon shows him that, although he has been victimized, he has no legal redress and he returns to his wife in despair.

They are very despondent until Mrs. Harrington is struck with a bright idea. Why not salt the claim themselves and make the grafters buy it back? Harrington hurries to the camp and buys a barrel of crude petroleum and rolls it to his claim where his wife assists him to pour oil in the low places and on the rocks. Concealing the barrel, they return to camp, where Will struts about talking about his lucky strike of oil, while his wife hurries to the hotel and gets ready to return to the ranch.

Jim Barlow and Tom Hunter overhear Harrington as he intended they should and, going to the claim, they make a hurried inspection, finding oil in the water and on the rocks. In their excitement and chagrin they do not for an instant suspect Harrington of any trick and, hastily consulting, decide they must buy back the claim, which they finally succeed in doing at about 1000 per cent profit for Harrington. They hurry the assayer to the claim, where he makes an inspection and then informs the grafters that they have been beat at their own game.

Will Harrington and his clever wife return to their ranch with an increased bank roll.

This remarkable picture is full of actual comedy of the most artistic sort and is handled with a freshness and originality that is unquestionably novel.

"BACK TO NATURE"

Thanhouser Release August 8th

After extracting the best that was in him in the course of twenty years' service, with them, the People's Insurance Company discharges Joe Jackson, a faithful bookkeeper. So at middle life Joe finds the sum-total of a "city career" a nervous wife, a drooping infant and a grown-up son and daughter, whom the city has converted into shallow, idle, selfish creatures. His own gains are a bank account that wouldn't stand the strain of city rent-paying and city living, while he was hunting a job, so Joe concluded to get "back to nature." He bought a farm with his savngs and transported himself there with his family, much against the wishes of two members thereof—the indolent son and daughter, of course. But farm life proved the best blessing that could have been wished on the pair. They finally jumped into it with a vim, and it ejuvenated them, making them self-respecting and self-supporting and winning the daughter a prosperous neighbor for a husband. And the country air gave the youngest child the good health that the city could not extend to it.

In his new world the farmer found that he had many friends, and he gradually became a person of influence among his neighbors, who had a chance to observe his sterling qualities. Oddly enough, it happened that many of them were policyholders in the insurance company that had once employed Joe, and there was a fight for control. And the farmers, who believed that the corporation needed to be reformed, decided to pool their influence and gave Joe their proxies. They had confidence in his knowledge and integrity, they knew he was not falling behind.

The contest between the two big "Interests" was so close that Joe, to his surprise and to that of others, found that he held the balance of power. And the President who had thrown him out was sure that the one-time clerk would now avenge himself.

But Joe proved he was mistaken. Of the two forces he preferred the old directors, and from his knowledge of the business, gained during his obscure work, he was able to impress the Board with the necessity for reforms he advocated. They expressed a willingness to carry out his idea, and he left the control of the company where it was.

The directors were impressed with the ability of Joe. The President admitted, shamefacedly, that the man had formerly been an employee, but had been "let out." The President went to Joe's farm to offer him another job, at much higher pay.

The farmer left the decision to his family, and the vote was unanimously "no." Each member of the household realized that he or she had gained morally and physically by going "back to nature," and the President returned to the city, wondering, but still envious of the happenings he saw in that obscure little upstate farm.

"CUPID THE CONQUEROR"

Thanhouser Release August 11th

A young artist, in love with a society girl, finally induces her to consent to pose for him, in a picture which he believes will be his masterpiece. And his confidence is increased when he finds just the child he wants for Cupid, to be in the painting with his lady fair.

The picture is a success, but the painter's courtship does not progress so favorably. He musters up courage enough to propose to the girl, and is utterly cast down when she refuses to give him a decided answer, although she does not actually reject him.

He waits, hoping to hear from her, but without result. Looking at the nearly completed painting, he wishes that he could invoke the power of Cupid to aid him, and dozes off. And naturally Cupid does come to him—in his dreams.

But Cupid, like the artist, has a hard time of it. He finds that for once his arrows are not potent, and not only is he scorned, but he is harshly treated. Altogether, it is a sad and mightily ruffled little Cupid who calls to tell of the failure of his mission.

But when Cupid is really determined, you cannot avoid him. And in this case Cupid was on the job. Failing as a gentle Knight of Love, he adopted the coarse methods of the up-to-date highwayman, and at the point of a revolver compelled the maiden to stand and deliver her heart. Then he returned in triumph.

The artist awoke to find it was all a dream. But sometimes dreams come true, and this one did, for the girl who surrendered to the "dream Cupid" gave her hand and fortune to the painter who loved her.

"WHEN RUBEN CAME TO TOWN"

Solax Release Aug 2d

Young Miss Ray, a winsome country lass, married to an old millionaire, with a big elaborate house on Fifth Avenue, N. Y. City, becomes lonesome and pines for her own people. She accordingly sends for her country aunt and cousin and asks them to visit her. The aunt arrives and brings in tow the gawky country boy, Osca. Fearing that he will disgrace her she gives him strict orders to imitate his aunt's husband's every move at the table. This he accordingly does to the amazement and chagrin of the husband. The dining room scene is an uproar from start to finish. The husband finally becomes wise and then the fun begins. Seeing that Osca imitates his every movement he immediately starts all sorts of ridiculous actions and culminate his antics when he tips back in his chair and Osca, following his actions does the same, loses his balance and finding himself going over backward grabs the table cloth and brings the whole thing down with him.

Osca succeeds in getting himself into all sorts of scrapes and after a short stay during which time he keeps the entire household in an uproar he is shipped off to the country where they all decide he certainly belongs.

"THE MASCOT OF TROOP 'C'"

Solax Release Aug. 4th

Golden-haired little Buster, a sturdy, manly lad of eight, is mascot of troop C, 15th Cavalry. The men all idolize Buster and vie with one another in winning his affection. Among Buster's most cherished possessions is an old donkey, "Jennie," which has been given by the men, and a little two wheeled cart. Driving through the post one day Buster comes across a fair-haired little maiden, whose name is May, who, accompanied by her uncle, an officer, is out for a stroll. Buster is much impressed with the little girl, and his interest is apparently reciprocated. Later at guard mount they again meet and he promises to show her his donkey. Buster gallantly invites his lady fair for a ride.

Immensly interested they drive farther away from the post than safety justifies and are captured by a prowling band of Indians. Taken by the Indians into their village the children are thrust into a wigwam for the night. Buster, however, manages to escape under the cover of darkness, mounting one of the Indian ponies hastens back to the post for aid. Troop "C" responds to the appeal of their mascot and with Buster at their head are soon on their way to the rescue. They quickly reach the Indian village, a thrilling fight ensues which results in victory for the troop and the rescue of Buster's little friend.

"THE BURGLAR AND THE GIRL"

Great Northern Release Aug 5th

A thrilling and romantic story. The opening scenes show a burglary being performed by a burglar, a member of the "swell mob." Though detectives are put on the scent, it is a very long while before they get a clue, so well has the thief covered his tracks. He establishes himself in society, and succeeds in becoming the fiance of a banker's daughter. Eventually a detective arrives with a bag of safe-opening tools belonging to the thief, and denounces him. Before being taken away to justice, his sweetheart, oblivious of everything, bestows upon him one last embrace.

MR. INSISTER

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

MR. INSISTER SAYS: THINK of "ROMEO AND JULIET" NOW and INSIST on it around Friday, August Fourth, when it is RELEASED. (Part I.)

Released Friday, August 11. The Little Winged God at His Best

Cupid the Conqueror

is one of the neatest phantasy pictures we ever put forth on a market that fancies phantasies when they're well done. Phantasies in films are rare because they are really difficult to produce, calling for stage and photographic tricks that are not always sure of success. So the straight drama or comedy is much preferred by the picture maker. Here, however, we give you a film that YOU prefer—an unusual story, with unusual effects, unusually presented, and really worth unusual effort to book. No. 234. Code Word, Curor.

Scene from "Romeo and Juliet" in 2 Reels

Released Tuesday, Aug. 8. Where Many of Us Should Go:

Back to Nature

is a lesson in success—showing that the obtaining of it in the prosperous city is actually much more difficult than "back on the farm." Of course, the accepted idea is that the tattered country boy comes to the city and makes a fortune; but fortunes of this making are really the exceptions and the country boy who succeeds is usually the country boy who leaves the overcrowded city alone and "works" his farm into a paying proposition. In the present picture, this realization comes to one who was NO boy—indeed, a broken-down "city failure" of middle years. But even at his age he changed a city knock-down to a "back-to-nature" triumph, and resurrected a drooping wife and family along with himself. No. 233. Code Word, Nate.

Built for Service

The keynote of mechanical construction nowadays is the capacity for service. The buyer of any piece of mechanism demands service. Whether it is a saw-mill, a harvester, an automobile or a watch, the intelligent purchaser buys for service. It must do what it is intended to do; it must do it well; it must do it without breakdowns; and it must do it for a long time.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6 is the only American moving picture machine which has been truly "built for service."

In design, materials and workmanship it is adapted to yield the service that satisfies.

Our booklet, "The Proof of the Pudding," tells in the words of exhibitors in every state in the Union the kind of service it gives;

Our guarantee of one year against wear and breakage insures long service; and

Our sales of fifteen hundred "Number Sixes" since New Year's show how extensively it is going into service.

No matter what price you pay, "Power's No. 6" is the best value you can get. Send for catalog and proposition D.

To Every Exhibitor in the United States

New York, July 27th, 1911.

DEAR SIR:

It has come to our knowledge that numerous suits have been brought in different parts of the country against exhibitors upon the Latham Loop Patent No. 707934 and the Pross Patent No. 722382, (for the Pross Revolving Shutters) and that other suits may possibly be begun against other exhibitors. There is nothing in these suits that need alarm any exhibitor. The Trust gains no legal advantage whatever from beginning these numerous suits or from prosecuting them. There is already a suit pending on the Latham loop patent, in which testimony is being taken and which suit we are defending. We have every reason to expect a decision in our favor in this suit and that will conclusively settle all of the suits now brought or being brought. The Trust recognizes this and is endeavoring before a decision against it to try to scare the timid exhibitors and those unacquainted with the facts into signing contracts with it to use only Trust films. It is a bluff pure and simple. The Pross patent has not been sustained and no injunction can be granted upon it until the end of one of the suits now begun and that will be a long time in the future. We have complete and adequate defenses to this patent. The fact that the Trust or its predecessor in interest has owned this patent for eight years without beginning suit is a pretty good defense in and of itself alone that the patent is worthless and that suit is brought upon it only as a last resort and as a bluff. We are prepared to defend the Latham suit and will defend it, and will defend the Pross suit and will protect our customers.

You need not be at all alarmed over the suit if one is brought against you and if you will furnish us, through your exchange, the information we need and send us, through them, the papers that have been served upon you or any that are served upon you in the future we will have our attorneys enter an appearance in your behalf and file an answer for your protection. You need not take any further trouble than giving us the necessary data and keeping us apprised of any papers that may be served upon you.

Yours faithfully,

MOTION PICTURE DISTRIBUTING AND SALES COMPANY.

A NEW EDITION OF MADISON'S BUDGET.

If the faces of vaudeville artists were wreathed in smiles during the past week, it was because they had read the welcome anouncement that Madison's Budget No. 14 is ready at last and that an ample supply of new comedy material of all kinds is on tap for the approaching season of 1911 and 1912.

Madison's Budget enjoys an enviable reputation in professional circles because it has always given a very heaping dollar's worth of value, but in the latest edition Mr. Madison has excelled all past records.

To do ample justice to the very complete list of contents would exhaust more space than we have at our disposal, therefore suffice it to say that Madison's Budget No. 14 contains eleven great monologues, ten fine acts for two males, seven acts for male and female, twenty parodies on latest songs, several complete minstrel first parts, a one-act farce running approximately an hour, acts for two females, for quartets, besides a bewildering variety of original jokes, gags, cross-fire talks, etc., etc.

The new issue marks the fourteenth birthday of Madison's Budget and although it contains more and better comedy material than ever before, the price will remain as usual one dollar a copy, thus permitting even the humblest member of the profession to offer to the public a very high standard of stage fun.

Mr. Madison, who supplies many noted stars such as Joe Welch, Jack Norworth, Mabel Hite, Al. Leech, Barney Bernard, Jack Wilson and Fred Duprez with exclusive material, has estimated that the various acts and specialties contained in Madison's Budget No. 14 would cost over $3,500 if written for an individual performer's needs.

So sure is he in fact that Madison's Budget No. 14 will give absolute satisfaction to all its subscribers, that money will be immediately returned if the book is not found to be worth at least fifty times its cost to any one in the profession.

The publication office is 1404 Third Avenue, New York.

COMING NEXT WEEK

A SENSATIONAL, ORIGINAL, FLYING A FEATURE
RELEASED THURSDAY, AUGUST 10th.

"THE RANCH GIRL"

This story is built around the rescue of a Cowboy by his pony. The action allotted the pony in this picture is educational in that it shows the intelligence and the affection of the average Western horse. The film is a feature in every respect, but the scenes in which the four-footed actor appears are extraordinary to a degree. A request for this feature entered now at your exchange will be conducive of an early booking.

RELEASE OF MONDAY, AUGUST 7th.

"CATTLE, GOLD AND OIL"

A FLYING A COWBOY COMEDY DRAMA.

Whatever you do or whatever you neglect to do, do not refrain from demanding of your exchange "THE PARTING TRAILS," and "THE RANCH GIRL." Ask your Exchange for them today.

THE AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO. CHICAGO

"TWO FLYING A COWBOY FEATURES"

RELEASED THIS WEEK, MONDAY, AUGUST 7th

"CATTLE, GOLD and OIL"

A quaint Western comedy drama picturing a ranchman's experience in the purchase of a salted mine. The story unfolded in the film is full of interest and the situations depicted extremely laughable. A Western feature in all that the name implies.

Pauline Bush and Warren Kerrigan in "CATTLE, GOLD AND OIL"

Warren Kerrigan's Rescue by His Cow-Pony in film entitled "THE RANCH GIRL"

RELEASED THIS WEEK, THURSDAY, AUGUST 10th

"THE RANCH GIRL"

Featuring the rescue of Warren Kerrigan from the hands of outlaws, through the medium of his cow-pony. This rescue is startling and is a liberal education in the intelligence of the horse. The film is a thrilling one throughout its entire length. Just the class of production that the exhibitor requires during the hot summer months.

Arrange to obtain both of these films from your exchange today—all Independent Exchanges buy the Flying A product.

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, AUG. 15.
Can This Be True?

Nobody Loves a Fat Woman

Whether this actually or always applies, is a debatable point, but after seeing the picture you can see why our fat lady felt it did. Poor Fatty! no one had any use for her, she figured. But she was wrong. SOMEBODY had. BUT IT WASN'T JACK, our hero! He had use for just one other girl in the entire wide world. So he naturally had no eyes for Fatty, even though she was worth $50,000 to him. This, with a few, real, funny misfortunes, decided her in the view that furnishes our title. No. 237. Code Word, Noan.

RELEASED FRIDAY, AUG. 16.
More Real Wreck Views

The Train Despatcher

is a tale of the rail that has become a classic on the H. T. & D. Road, where the incidents all transpired. Very exciting incidents they were, too, with a pretty girl train despatcher taking the leading part in them. She actually climbed a huge, swaying telegraph pole, managed to "tap the wire" and so averted a most terrible railroad disaster. All these thrilling things we show in the picture. The reel will be famous for the daring work of its chief character, the realistic wreck scenes and the fine "railroad atmosphere" throughout. No. 238. Code Word, Despa.

EXHIBITORS

The National Convention for the formation of the Exhibitors' League brought out one fact, and that is, the theory advanced so many times in the columns of the News is at last bearing fruit. Some four and a half to five years ago we strongly advocated the formation of local or state associations, which should eventually lead to the formation of a national organization as is now formed and in full working order.

We congratulate the numerous delegates who attended the convention at Cleveland and became instrumental in launching forth the national league. It now needs only the full complete co-operation of every state in the Union to place the exhibitors in the position we have so many times suggested they should be, viz., upon the exhibitors depends the whole success of the Cinematograph industry, and we have always contended that in their hands lies the solution of every problem facing nickelodia today.

In the first place almost up to the present time the exhibitors are apt to be content with what the exchanges choose to give them and in many instances they have been very hard pressed to give their patrons what they called for. Then legislation of a very adverse kind has been put in action in many cities to the great disadvantage of the exhibitor. With the formation of the National League a great deal of this will be prevented in the future, and the exhibitor through his local state or national organization will be able to avert pending litigation, relieve the tension on legislation already passed and in a general sense be able to clean the slate and start a fresh copy.

A suggestion was made at the league that the officers would be antagonistic to the manufacturers and try to control what they put out. We do not think the manufacturers have anything to fear on this score, because the general tendency is an uplift of the whole industry. The trend is to take more largely an educational basis in every exhibit to the public, and in talking with some of the prominent exhibitors we were glad to learn that the proportion of educational to comedy and drama patrons was about half and half.

Some question arose in general conversation about the censorship of the bill, and every satisfaction was expressed with the present Censorship Board and boards of other states. A great deal of satisfaction was expressed regarding the general tendency of the manufacturers to eliminate from their stories everything bearing upon the nature of an indecent, suggestive manner or robbery, such as held largely in the past, and with a general co-operation of the exhibitor with the exchange men and through them the manufacturer, only real good and advancement will be the result of the National League.

Many cities already have their exhibitors' associations, some of which were represented at the convention, and others were very conspicuous by their absence. This is not as it should be. We believe it will be fully to the best interests of every city or state organization to become allied with the National.

One advantage of this association for mutual interests would be the doing away with the impost of $2.00 per week graft, imposed by the M. P. P. Co. We do not know if the exhibitor is fully awake to the facts that every machine bearing a license plate in his possession is not his property; while he pays anywhere from $175.00 to $250.00 for the machine, it is only loaned to him. Not only that, but $104.00 per annum must be paid for the privilege of using that machine. While the National League has nothing to do with either Trust or Independent questions in their legal aspect, yet as they are about equally divided they certainly are very much interested in the subject, and talking over a patent question with a very able jurist we were informed that if the Trust lose their suits, which they are more than likely to do, every man who has paid $2.00 per week under protest can get that money refunded under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and the National League is the body to enforce the repayment of these unjust exactions.

A DOG IN THE MANGER—CAN YOU BEAT IT?

The management of the Hippodrome in Cleveland had invited the manufacturers attending the National League to exhibit their films for the benefit of the assembled delegates. Mr. John Rock of Chicago was "Johnny on the Spot," and hearing of these arrangements, he immediately wired to New York to the Patents Company, and in reply there came back from the Grandmother of Fifth Avenue the information that if Independent film was shown in this house the license of the Patent Company would be immediately cancelled, and this being a Keith & Proctor house, the licenses of all their other houses would also suffer.

Some people like to throw boomerangs, and we can assure the Patents Company that this short-sighted policy strengthens the hands of the Independent faction immensely, rebounding to the credit of the latter, whom it scarcely touches, but returns to the thrower and hits them mighty hard.

Cleveland Convention of the Exhibitors' League

We arrived in Cleveland early Tuesday morning and hieing ourselves to the Gillsy Hotel, the headquarters of the Association, we found a few congenial spirits had already registered, whom we were very glad to meet and shake hands again with, as they were henchmen in former fights which we will remember, notably Philadelphia, Chicago and Pittsburg; then to greet the others from other quarters of the States was worth the sacrifice, if sacrifice it can be called, of coming from New York to Cleveland.

The work of the convention had already commenced and when we got into the meeting room at the Webber Hall we found quite a large assembly of men looking at the various projecting machines, among which we noted the Powers in charge of Mr. Cole; the Symplex, represented by Messrs. Cannock and Renbold; the Motiograph, in the care of Mr. Woodworth, and also the Edengraph and Edison's latest model. These machines were the cynosure of all eyes and were very capably explained by the various representatives. We found that the arrangements for the entertainments had been placed in the hands of a capable body of men, of which Mr. S. E. Morris was chairman, Mr. W. J. Slimn, C. G. Thompson, J. E. Weillis, H. P. Isaacs and G. H. Wilk were staunch lieutenants. The preliminary arrangements of the meeting proper were in the hands of Mr. H. E. Neff, president; Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Morris, vice-presidents, with Mr. E. Pettis acting as secretary. Preliminary arrangements by the appointing of committees to make the preliminary nominational, advisory, press and legal matters.

Conversation among the members elicited the fact that the whole of the delegates present were in favor of raising the price of admission from five to ten cents. The committee to draft a preamble of the constitution which was composed of Peter J. Jupe, of Detroit; W. J. Sweeney, Chicago; H. S. Dickson, Winchester, Ind.; H. C. Farley, Montgomery, Ala.; H. S. Klein, Milwaukee; John J. Huss, Cincinnati, and J. H. McDonald, Pittsburg.

After these arrangements were made the assembly were invited to take an automobile tour through Cleveland, and gradually everyone got seated in some thirty to forty automobiles, starting on a forty-mile trip in and around Cleveland proper to the great Lake Erie, then back again to the Heights and Garfield Monument of Garfield Park.

The writer unfortunately did not take this trip into the Heights. For why? Well, just because. This, being a lady's answer, won't satisfy our readers, so we must take them in our confidence and tell them why. Mr. Morris, the chairman, seeing to the guests getting the best there was from the garages, kept for himself and party the worst machine of the bunch, and the passengers therein comprised Mr. S. A. Morris, Tom Cohen, Mr. J. Klein, Mr. W. C. Kasper, another gentleman whose name we have forgotten and the editor. Then we started out for fun and got it. Someone started telling jokes and among them was one of a certain charitable organization giving free pictures to the children. Mr. Morris, being interested in knowing what sort of pictures they were, stopped one of the boys and asked him how he liked them. "Aw go on," said the boy, "I don't like 'em at all. They were standin' pictures." A little further on one of the automobiles broke down, but this happened to be opposite the garage and that was easy to repair. Mr. Kasper waved his hand and said, "Good-bye, hard luck." We remarked, "Don't holler till you're out of the wood." This seemed to be our undoing, for our chauffeur missed the crowd and went off on his own, along the route where Mr. Morris thought we might meet the body of automobiles returning from the Heights. Going up a hill some six miles out of Cleveland the machine broke down and then the blame came on "we." Poor us, didn't we get it? Well, the chauffeur tried to make some repairs, but all to no good. We certainly were landed in a country lane. Mr. Morris's hope lay in the fact that it was possible—just possible—that some of the others might come this way. After waiting half an hour a kind samaritan came along and took back two, leaving four of us, then another car came along belonging to the party occupied by Mr. Schering, carrying Mr. and Mrs. Neff, just enough to fill the car. Ten minutes after along came another car. We held that up, too. In this latter car was Reubenstein, Bernstein, Kennedy and one or two other congenial spirits, so at last we were rescued and ultimately reached Cleveland.

Back to the meeting place where we found a large number waiting for the exhibition of the pictures (we refer our readers to our editorial column for a little paragraph on this point), and through the good offices of Mr. Mandelbaum a theater was secured and all the manufacturers' offerings were received with applause. This finished up Tuesday.

Wednesday morning the exhibitors worked within closed doors. This gave us time to make a few calls in the city. At one o'clock the Sales Company invited the assembled exhibitors to lunch at the Hollenden Hotel, which was accepted. After all had done justice to the good things provided, Mr. Brulator, the president of the Sales Company, was asked for a speech. In responding he said, among other things, that the Sales Company was only looking for the advancement of the Independent interests, and to all these interests every exhibitor was a factor and interested in their progress.

Referring to the incident of the Patents Company, debarring the use of the Hippodrome, he expressed his sorrow for the smallness of the act, remarking that it would reflect more upon them than it did on us. The question of the Patents was one in which the Sales Company had won all along the line. They had beat the M. P. P. Co. with their own weapons and this is what they are going to continue to do. There was no camera patent on the market. It was free to all to use any camera they wished, and every manufacturer would be welcomed into the Sales Company on a pro rata basis providing he could make good film, which was a sine qua non. He further remarked that the Latham Loop was a farce. The Patents Company would never dare to attack the exhibitors on this, but they had brought suit against the Sales Company members, attacking them on this point, which was not yet adjudicated, owing to the fact that the lawyers were constantly askin- for delay. Any exhibitor receiving summons on these questions would be fully protected, as the Sales Company were bringing injunctions in every state of the Union against the Patents Company, restraining them from bringing any other suits against exhibitors until the full settlement of the suit and the adjudications of the patents. Following Mr. Brulator's address, he called upon the representatives of the manufacturers to make their bow to the assembled exhibitors, among whom we must mention Mr. Sterne, of Imp; Mr. Engel, of Rex; Mr. Powers, of Powers Picture Place; Mr. Kennedy, of the American; Mr. Dintenfass, of Champion, and Mr. Bernstein, of Yankee. And last but not least Mr. Miles, the secretary of the Sales Company.

A witty saying we must not pass by was given when Mr. Brulator asked for some remarks, and it may be here stated that the Catholic Order of Foresters are holding their convention at the same time. One of the exhibitors asked Mr. Brulator what the flags with C. O. F. meant. Mr. Brulator replied as above. The querient remarked, "No, it stood for the Concentration of Film Men." Mr. Neff then in a neat speech closed the proceedings and the assembly returned to resume later after refreshments, while ye editor adjourned to his hotel to dictate this item to a sweet stenographer.

In addition to the above a meeting of the Exhibitors' League of Indiana was organized at Cleveland on August 1st. The constitution and by-laws were adopted and the following officers elected for the first year. President, H. S. Dickson, Winchester; first vice-president, Charles Fife, Logansport; second vice-president, Edward Horning, Michigan City; secretary and treasurer, J. F. Rembusch, Shelbyville; executive committee, the above officers with the addition of D. S. Haines, Evansville; Henry Smith, Ft. Wayne, and John Young, of Terre Haute. We understand another meeting will be held in Indianapolis within two months, at the call of the president, when plans will be perfected to push the organization in the state of Indiana.

MR. WM. SHORT'S ILLUSTRATED LECTURE ON TUBERCULOSIS AT KEITH & PROCTOR'S FOURTEENTH STREET THEATRE — AND OTHER THINGS

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

Who says that there is no demand for the educational picture? I do not say "film" in this instance, because I find many of the lectures given in the theatres and elsewhere are illustrated by lantern slides as well as moving pictures, therefore the word "picture" fills the bill and covers the ground much better, because it includes the stationary as well as the moving picture.

The theatres are responding very cautiously—not reluctantly—to a slight vibration of interest in the public's bump of appreciation for better things—for pictures from which they can learn something.

The fore part of last week I happened in Keith & Proctor's Fourteenth Street Theatre. An illustrated lecture on the dread disease tuberculosis was under way. After the Red Cross film, depicting scenes from the experiences of a district nurse of how she cares for the sick, making cleanliness and sanitary conditions compulsory wherever it falls to her lot to pursue her work, the remainder of illustrations were given by means of lantern slides, and most interesting they were. The lecturer, Mr. Wm. Short, went briefly but thoroughly into the subject of tuberculosis, the cause of the spreading of the disease, its treatment by Dr. Robert Koch's method, by which some 10,000 individuals are saved every year, the question of heredity and so forth. The things that Mr. Short told to his audience require to be told and retold, told and retold until they are thoroughly and firmly stamped upon the public mind. The germs of the disease are in the mucus which the consumptive coughs up, millions of which are coughed up daily. Through promiscuous expectorating, and the dried mucus being blown hither and thither, is the disease spread. Also are the germs conveyed to the lungs of children through the careless habit of the consumptive mother of kissing her little ones, regardless of the death's head concealed in her caresses. Children are very susceptible to the disease—so says Mr. Short—may look strong, yet having the tubercular germs at work in their little bodies, awaiting an untoward moment when the flesh is weak to spring upon the throat of the victim. Then again there are many pale, delicate anaemic children in whom are found no trace of the germs. These children, as well as the afflicted ones, are sent in large numbers each year from the city to the homes and hospitals provided for the care of such children. Good fresh air and plenty of exercise of a healthful nature is given them. Open air schools are also provided where the children (the weaker ones) recline in reclining chairs in the schoolroom, warmly wrapped up while they study their lessons and are taught by the teachers. There are a number of societies throughout the country which are doing a good work for those afflicted with the terrible "white plague."

I understand that in Boston is the headquarters of the lectures which are given from time to time in the Keith & Proctor theatres. Lectures on different educational subjects are provided with suitable illustrations and assigned to those employed by the Keith & Proctor people to deliver them. This is a good move, and only goes to show that, after all, the trend of the times is to progress.

It is interesting to note the remarks of different people regarding moving pictures. In my rovings my ears are ever open to catch the drift of public opinion. Just the other day I was in conversation with a woman when the conversation turned on moving pictures. She had evidently not given the subject much thought, but had received her impression through being thrown up against pictures of the sensational, melo-dramatic style. In relating the story of a lecture which had been given at the church which she attended, she threw up her hands in holy horror. "Why," she said, "I just disgraced myself. While the lecturer rested they showed some moving pictures—I wish you could have seen them."

"Why, what was the trouble?" I asked.

"Oh, I just wish you could have seen them—a woman got on a bicycle and started to ride down the road at an awful rate, and first there was a big crowd of people sitting out, and she rode clear through those people, and I wish you could have seen the commotion, and she went on and on, and did all kinds of stunts with that bicycle. Oh, it wasn't bad, of course—but in the church—I just laughed till I nearly fell off the seat." And with this a fit of merriment seized her and she laughed again a side splitting laugh.

She had not considered probably the aid the comedy in this picture had been in the dispersion of an overflow of bile, from which in all possibility her system had been suffering. Again she told of a friend who said she had gone once to a moving picture show, but that she would never go again. The picture which had been the cause of the resolution was one showing a man who had accidentally come, in his wanderings through a wilderness, upon a tract of ground where there was quicksand. She explained to her companion: "I sat and watched him sink down into the sand until it was just even with his mouth, and then I could stand it no longer; I had to get up and go out."

The moving picture has reached a point where the tactics of the producers must be changed, else they will suffer not only ridicule, but a wane in the business. They must wake up to the necessity of the times. There was a time when melodrama and low comedy were appreciated, but that time has passed. We want comedy—yes—but we want good clean comedy. It is good to laugh, and we cannot always be serious; in fact to take life too seriously is to fail in many of the things that we would accomplish. There is a cry among the masses for the educational film. The producers must heed, otherwise it will mean destruction to their business.

COLLEEN BAWN

To Be Issued by Yankee Film Co. on August 21st

Yankee progressiveness has again asserted itself in the coming production of August 21st, viz., "Colleen Bawn," the play made famous by Dion Boucicault and Laura Keene. The first New York production took place at the Laura Keene Theater on March 27, 1860. Among the performers who participated at that time were many who have since become famous in the theatrical world: Dion Boucicault, Laura Keene, H. F. Daly, Agnes Robertson, Charles Fisher, Mme. Ponisi, Josephine Henry and many others. The story is too well known to need repeating, for where can one find a man, woman or child who is not acquainted with the well beloved characters of Myles na Cappaleen, Hardress Creegan, Danny Mann, dear old Father Tom, Eily O'Connor, Anne Chute, Sheelah or any of the other quaint souls who have endeared themselves to a pleasure loving public.

After many months of preparation, during which time a trip was made across the ocean with the entire company in order to bring into the picture the most beautiful scenery in the world, the shores of Killarney Lakes, and a genuine Irish atmosphere which could not be obtained elsewhere, the Yankee Film Co. is ready to launch its maiden effort in Irish classics.

No effort or expense has been spared to make this a masterpiece in production as well as photography, and the costumes used of the period of 1790 were specially made for the occasion. The film strictly adheres to the play as produced by the original company headed by the famous Dion Boucicault.

"MYLES, HOW CAN I EVER THANK YOU?" "SURE, WHEN YOU DIE, LEAVE YOUR MONEY TO THE POOR, YER WIDDER TO ME, AN' WE'LL BOTH FORGIVE YE!"

BREAD UNION'S NOVEL IDEA

The first meeting of the executive committee of the Tri-State Anti-Bread Trust Conference was held Sunday, July 23d, at Gosweiler's Hall, No. 240 East 80th Street, New York, to arrange plans for fighting, with the aid of moving picture shows, the Bread Trust, which, the unions say, is preparing to invade the East Side and compete with the Jewish bakeries in making the kosher rye bread eaten by the Jewish people.

The conference was organized several days ago at a meeting of delegates from fifty-six locals of the Journeymen Bakers' International Union in the States of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. It represents a membership of ten thousand. The chairman of Sunday's meeting was August Diederich, of Bakers' Union No. 144, of Yonkers. During the meeting it was stated that three large baking corporations, each controlling a number of subsidiary concerns, which had been fighting each other, are now going to combine into one trust.

Child labor, it was said, is employed in many of the large bakeries, boys doing part of the work, and a resolution was passed at the meeting to make arrangements with film concerns to prepare fifty thousand films for moving pictures, showing the boys at work and the way the bakeries are operated.

Max Freund, of the International executive board of the bakers' unions, said last evening that the executive committee of the conference will meet once a fortnight during the expected fight with the combination of employers.

"I had a visit," he added, "from a representative of the Department of Justice from Washington, who wanted to know if I had any evidence that the large baking concerns were violating the Sherman anti-trust law. I told him I was not well informed enough on the matter at present to give an opinion, and he said he would take up the matter with officers of the unions later."

MOVING PICTURES AS A SOCIAL WORKER

By A. L. Barrett

The universal language of pictured stories can be utilized as a social worker in various ways and in no better than among the newly arrived foreigners, who are simply game for the human parasites who swarm any places likely to be frequented by emigrants. It is practically impossible, however, for any governments to adequately protect this class, but with the aid of the moving pictures a great improvement could be effected. It would be a very easy matter for the governments on both sides of the Atlantic to have moving picture screens installed at the places of embarking and landing and depict thereon some of the multifarious schemes practiced on this side for the ruin of foreigners as they leave the steamers. This would not deter the emigrants from coming here, but would serve to make them more alert, and there would be the advantage of having a little more intelligence shipped over than is now the case. A large percentage of the tragedies and misery in the poorer sections is caused simply by want of information on subjects of the most vital importance to the foreigner and the class of emigrant who would be frightened out of coming here by such pictures could easily be spared. The most experienced traveler is frequently ensnared by these sharpers and no more easy prey than a group of foreigners entirely ignorant of the country, possibly not one among them who can speak the English language, could well be imagined. The younger generations especially need this protection, as neither the advice nor foreknowledge of parents and guardians will suffice to protect them from the snares awaiting them, and when we remember the horrible disclosures of a couple of years ago, it seems remarkable that so many of the young girls escape. There should be picture plays representing these schemes, the manner in which they are carried out and the final loss of the victims in the human maelstrom. There should also be shown the methods of many of the so-called employment agencies who advertise for foreign help, the various ways in which the unsuspecting foreigners are imposed on, the hopeless quests after situations that either never exist or that the agency manager knows are already gone before the victim is sent there, and the places to which they are sometimes sent. There is no need of listing the countless methods employed for fleecing foreigners, but forewarned is forearmed, and with the pictures representing the various schemes—in which the foreigners are invariably the losers—still fresh in their memories, there would be a decided improvement in this respect.

Then the conditions of life here are entirely different to what they have been accustomed. Many of them come from small farms or peasant holdings and the change from the fresh country air to a crowded tenement street, with two or three small and dark rooms, is evident at once and sickness quickly results. Incalculable good has been accomplished in many cities by the various methods adopted by Boards of Health and by sending inspectors and others round to the tenement districts to instruct the ignorant or foreign mothers how to prepare food for infants and take care of children, but if, instead of or temporarily in conjunction with, this the various Boards of Health had picture plays illustrating these subjects, with the few words that are occasionally necessary in every picture play, printed in two of the predominating languages of the district, as well as in English, a larger number of the population would be reached, much time saved and a larger proportion of infant mortality would be prevented. They could be used in the same way to illustrate the absolute necessity for cleanliness and care in household matters, showing, of course, with the truthful vividness possible by no other medium but the moving pictures, the plain connection between the heap of refuse in kitchen or area and disease and death.

These picture stories could also portray the unsanitary conditions which are the origin of diphtheria, the commencement and progress of the disease—with pictures of the throat and membraneous passages becoming more and more ulcerated—the suffering and wasting away of the victim, the final struggle for breath and the death agonies. Immediately after this could be pictured the manner in which this horrible disease could be avoided by proper regard to the laws of health, and if these picture plays, representing the dangers attendant on carelessness and ignorance of such laws did not have the proper effect, it is certain that no ordinary lectures or instructions on the subject would, for the pictured stories would be too realistic to be forgotten, and as a matter of fact many of the audience would have already seen the suffering of some friend or relative, and would be only too willing to know how to avoid a recurrence of the scenes.

Then there should be picture plays showing the depredations wrought by the ordinary house fly, originating perhaps from some decaying matter, and finally winging his destructive flight through space, as if he were not sufficiently verminous himself, taking his first rest at some typhoid infected place, immediately afterwards alighting on the soft face of a sleeping baby, again continuing his career of destruction, infecting everything with which he comes in contact and entering the foulest places imaginable, landing finally on a breakfast table, where he falls into a glass of milk, from which he is carefully fished by a humane and curious child, who allows the infected vermin to crawl all over his hands, arms and neck, interestingly watching the fly "come alive again," and then drinking the glass of milk! A picture story on this subject would prove of wonderful interest to children, also, and his adventures would claim their interest till the closing scene. Then could be shown the havoc wrought by the poison inoculated into the first child touched and the spread of disease by this one medium alone. Pictures of this kind would suffice to convince the audience of the importance of excluding the house fly at any cost, and they would quickly see the cause—i. e., decaying matter and general uncleanliness—and the effect—disease and death —and which the picture play would prove to them, by the aid of vision (than which nothing is more conclusive), to be so closely connected that nothing further would be needed to impress on the audience the necessity for cleanliness and care in domestic concerns. In nine cases out of ten ignorance of the commonest laws of nature is responsible for sickness and disease, especially in the poorer ections.

Irrepective, however, of what the municipal governments will finally be induced to do, people would come in large numbers to see picture plays on the above and kindred subjects, and it would be the means of increasing the audiences. The picture plays are attractive to all classes and ages, and if mothers knew that on a given date certain pictures would be shown that would in some cases assist them to prevent disease, and in others to intelligently combat it when it appeared, they would naturally visit the picture houses when and where such information was to be given, taking their children with them, and these picture-lectures, in combination with the knowledge that the picture playhouses were perfectly safe places to allow their older children to visit, and where they could obtain both amusement and information, would be another great point in favor of the motion pictures.

If such picture-lectures were advertised, say, three times a week by a local manager, it is tolerably certain that his place would be more crowded than any others in the neighborhood, and it would also be frequented by the more educated classes, who could not but stamp it with their seal of approval, thus bringing the once reviled picture plays before the favorable notice of an intelligent class whose good will it is to the interest of the moving picture industry to gain, and thus dispose of another weapon against the "horrible moving pictures" by showing how they can be used in the improvement of the health and intelligence of any community.

"ROMEO AND JULIET" IN TWO REELS

The Thanhouser feature production of "Romeo and Juliet" in two reels has been whipped into shape for showing and a press view was held early this week at which the subject was voted satisfactory. It releases on consecutive Fridays, part one showing Friday, September first, and part two Friday, September eighth. Prior to this private exhibitions will be given for exchange men and other interested parties, and the film of "the greatest love story of all" will be given chance a plenty to make good with the people who distribute the Independent product.

The reels are so constructed that each tells a complete story on its own account. Giving a half-hour's show as they do when used together, they will enable exhibitors to give a "Romeo and Juliet Night" that affords all manners of opportunity for feature advertising. Many managers will use them as they appear for the first showing, and book them together for the return date. Theater lecturers wanting data on the subject will find the following useful:

The play tells of two rival noble families of Verona, who for several generations have been bitter foes. The offspring of these families, Juliet, daughter of the Capulets, and Romeo, son of the Montagues, meet and love, before they know that, on account of the family feud, they can never be united in marriage. Their love is too strong, however, to permit anything to stand in its way, and knowing they can never obtain their parents' consent they are secretly wed.

Shortly after this young Romeo is banished from Padua for dueling and is compelled to bid his young bride farewell. During his absence Capulet endeavors to force his daughter, Juliet, to marry a nobleman he has chosen for her.

In her distress Juliet turns to the Friar who secretly married them. This kindly old man agrees to help the lovers. He gives Juliet a sleeping potion, which, after she has taken it, will make her seem dead. It is his intention to take the supposedly dead Juliet from her tomb and reunite her to her banished husband.

He sends a message to Romeo, telling him of the plan, but unfortunately news of Juliet's death reached Romeo before the Friar's message. The distracted youth purchases a vial of poison, and, taking it with him to the tomb, where he finds the apparently lifeless body of Juliet, he drains the deadly potion. Juliet revives soon after this, and finding on the steps of the tomb the body of her beloved husband takes her own life. When the Friar arrives upon the scene, intending to free Juliet and unite the lovers, he finds them already tragically united in death.

FROM THE SPECTATOR'S VIEWPOINT

By H. Renbold

Can any one explain why so many otherwise fine examples of M. P. subjects are rendered inane and oftentimes actually obnoxious when the film arrives at the lovemaking scenes?

The story we will assume is interestingly told and plausible enough, is thoroughly well constructed, and the care for detail, plus knowledge of stagecraft, is apparent, yet when the love action arrives, the otherwise pleasing result previously obtained is utterly discounted by either foolish horseplay, or excessive and therefore overdone hugging and kissing, and where this ensues it can only cause a black mark to be registered against M. P. shows in general.

I have often sat with children enjoying a picture, but when the love element is portrayed I have grown uncomfortable to have them witnessing such nauseating scenes, where dignity and self-respect is thrown to the winds.

Another serious mistake on the part of the M. P. directors is to portray a forsaken girl with a baby in her arms or in the scene at all. If for the action of the story it is needful to indicate that she has become a mother, why cannot this be indicated, say, by the actress picking up a little dress and looking at it for a few moments (a cradle might be in the scene)? This would be quite sufficient for the adult part of the audience, and would obviate the dreaded questioning by the little ones.

No grown-up would allow children of tender years to peruse a book dealing with such a subject. Then, in the name of all that's reasonable, why should such an episode be flagrantly exhibited before them. The constant cry of the bulk of the exhibitors is the absence of all objectionable or suggestive features from the pictures they exhibit, as they realize the financial advantage that will accrue to them if adults bringing children can be assured that the proprietor's statement on this head may be taken at its full value.

This being the case, it seems apparent to me that, for the mutual advantage of the manufacturer and exhibitor, a director may, with considerable credit to himself and his firm, eliminate or tone down features the actual presentment of which, considering the spectators, can serve no good purpose.

REX HAS COLUMBUSED

a new trait in the American Indian—and puts the discovery in a picture that is a treat.

"A White Redman"

RELEASED THURSDAY, AUG. 10th.

is a new one on you for local color, isn't it? It's a film with an Indian who has an original personality, and teaches us a lesson of sacrifice and stoic fortitude that should be long remembered. It tells a sound and subtle tale of an Indian's loyalty and gratitude. An intensely human story, original and stimulating. Talk about "talking pictures"! This one is eloquent! The characters are worked in upon the brain with such exactness, perfection and realism that you will almost think you hear their voices.
This is not leap year, but the 80 foot leap the Indian makes at one part of the story is a thriller!

"A WHITE REDMAN"

are the colors to hang outside of your theatre to get the crowd inside.
It's strong, virile, vital—and a REX!

A Children's Paradise

A TRIP WITH A "YANKEE" REPRESENTATIVE AND HIS CAMERA MAN TO "THE CHILDREN'S PARADISE" AT NYACK, N. Y.

By Margaret I. MacDonald

As my train pulled out of Jersey City and sped along through the green fields toward the wooded hills overlooking the Hudson, and among which is situated "The Children's Paradise," I little knew of the delightfully beautiful and interesting sight which awaited me.

Saturday, the 29th, was a red letter day at the Home, for, in addition to the entertaining of three distinguished visitors, Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, Mrs. Kate Upson Clark and Rev. E. T. Sanford of the North Baptist Church, 234 West Eleventh street, New York City, Mr. Isadore Bernstein, accompanied by Mr. Wm. Wagner, a king of camera men, who is in the employ of the Yankee Film Company, and who has made with his own hands the camera which he has used constantly the past six years and a half, came to secure moving pictures of the Home, its teachers, and its youthful inmates.

Before going into detail about the taking of the pictures I want to tell you something about The Christian Herald's Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y., called by appreciative ones and those devoted to the charity "The Children's Paradise."

The Home consists of some five cottages, or dormitories, besides the Homestead, which is really the teachers' quarters, and which has a kitchen and dining-room attachment, the Children's dining-room, which is a large, airy pavilion, the appropriate appellation, "Fort Plenty," standing out open on all sides in bold gilt letters above its entrance, save the one behind which is hidden the culinary department of the children's quarters, and the beautiful chapel, artistic in architecture and decoration, with its panel windows of rich, soft shadings, through which old Sol persistently pokes his fingers, to lay them on the heads of the little ones assembled there, as Jesus did of old, when he said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

As you approach the portico shaped gate entrance, you see standing out in bold relief on the side of the archway the words, "I love God and little children"; as you pass in toward the opposite side, your eyes fall upon the words, "Let us live for the children," and on another side the words, "Fragile beginnings of a mighty end," prophetic of the ultimate result of a great work.

This institution at the present time can accommodate about three hundred children. The object of the institution is to give to children who are absolutely without means to obtain a vacation two weeks of fresh air and country life in this beautiful spot. It is so arranged that certain days each week a number of the children, having terminated their holiday, are taken back to the city and another lot is taken out to fill the places of those that have gone.

Children eligible to be sent to the Home are picked up by clergymen, Sunday school superintendents, day school teachers, and so on. Each child is examined by a doctor whose services have been secured for the purpose before being sent out, and if the child is found to have any contagious disease it is sent to the hospital or cared for in some way until it is in shape to take its holiday. When the children reach the Home they are bathed and their clothes carefully sterilized. The dormitories in which they sleep are beautifully clean, each child being provided with a comfortable cot and a lock box for its clothing. Everything about the place is sanitarily perfect. A very fine sewerage plant has just been installed, costing several thousand dollars. The refuse is dissolved, or dispersed, by means of chemicals, of which chloride of lime is the most important item, seven pounds of it being used to ten thousand gallons of sewerage. After being thus treated, the sewerage is passed in liquid form through pipes to the filter beds a little distance away from the plant, and which consist of layers of crushed stone, gravel and sand. On the surface of these filter beds are placed at equal distances cement grooves probably five inches across through which the liquid, now almost as clear as water, runs, and from thence into the filter beds of sand and gravel, and, being gathered into pipes a distance below, it is carried to the river 99 per cent. pure water. The swimming pool, which is now but a one-story building, will next year be replaced by a new one which will have an upper room of cement, where the children can romp. At intervals through the grounds are small water tanks, where the children may drink, and which water is supplied from an artesian well of 635 feet depth, pumped to the reservoirs on the hill beyond the cottages by a force pump pumping 60 gallons a minute with a nine horse-power gasoline engine.

There are fifteen teachers in the establishment, headed by Miss Goering, matron, and Mrs. Matthews, assistant matron, all of whom discharge their duties with a vim and enthusiasm befitting the cause.

The chapel work at this institution deserves special mention. I may mention here that children are taken regardless of religion, creed, color, or nationality. The musical work in the chapel is conducted by Mr. Henry P. Noll, a well-known organist of New York City. Mr. Noll is to be complimented on his success in teaching these children of transient residence two part singing. It is remarkable to hear their sweet, childish voices harmonize in the different parts.

The drills and walks out over the hills are conducted by Mr. Wm. Schirmer, by whose earnestness and interest in his work I was extremely touched. Mr. Schirmer, whose one supreme thought seems to be for the happiness and welfare of the children placed under his care, has for years interested himself in orphan work.

The Home was founded by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, and the work of erection was begun with money left over from the famous "Bread Line," at the suggestion of Mr. George H. Sandison, successor to Dr. Klopsch as editor of The Christian Herald. Mr. Sandison, as president of the Board of Directors, has from his beautiful home overlooking the Hudson, some two or three miles distant from Mont-Lawn, kept an eagle eye on the affairs of the place, and a great deal of the success of the institution is due to the untiring efforts of Mr. Sandison on its behalf. The Home is kept up by private donations which have been entirely voluntary, no solicitations for funds having been made. Twenty dollars will furnish a cot for the season, thereby supplying a bed for five poor little children in the ten weeks (from the beginning of July until after Labor Day) which the Home is open, and $20,000 is the total cost of running the institution in its present shape. The teachers are all college graduates and experienced in the work.

A series of excellent pictures were secured by the Yankee Film Company of daily scenes in the life at "The Children's Paradise." It was interesting to see their obedience to the bugle call of Mr. Schirmer, following him whither he led them—to the chapel, the dining-room, or the play-ground. These films will be shown in the near future, when it will be the privilege of the public to see from the theatre seat the romps of these children on their play-grounds, their salute to the flag of their country, which is very impressive, when, with eyes uplifted, the left hand holding a miniature duplicate of the large flag stationed in the center of the group of three hundred children, to which the right hand pointed, while with childish fervor they repeated the salute to the flag. The procession of children entering the chapel was also taken, as were the foot races which the children so thoroughly enjoyed, applauding and shrieking at the tops of their voices, totally unconscious of the grinding of the picture machine which was recording their every motion. As Mrs. Sangster and Mrs. Clark came upon the scene the carriage was stopped on the brow of the hill; when everything was in readiness for the taking of the picture it was allowed to move on to the entrance, while the children, headed by their Sergeant, came pell-mell down the lawn, rending the sky with their shouts of greeting.

The Yankee Film Company is to be congratulated upon being the first to take up the challenge of the Moving Picture News to manufacture educational films. They propose to release at least one educational film a month, of 300 feet, as an experiment.

The Yankee Film Company has been in existence but two years, and is practically in its infancy. From its resolution to take up the challenge in the face of opposing elements, points to a fact that must not be overlooked, that "Progress" is their motto.

Mr. Isadore Bernstein the only member of the company proper which I have had the pleasure of meeting, is an idealist. He had been engaged in philanthropic work for several years previous to his installation in the services of the Yankee Film Company. I was impressed, through conversation with Mr. Bernstein, with the fact that he was in the business not merely for the sake of the salary which he gets, but for the love of accomplishment along right lines. He told me in rather a shamefaced way that he really had come into the business with a view to elevating the moving picture stage. He seemed to feel himself a pigmy attacking a giant. He said in great earnestness, "Miss MacDonald, the one desire of my life at the present time is to form a company that will produce pictures that are worth while. Dramatize some of the great novels, give scenes of European peasant life—let us have pictures that are going to be some benefit to the people who see them." I feel confident that I am right when I say that with a man like Mr. Bernstein piloting a company it cannot but have success. At least success such as any company should wish for—success in becoming a factor in the advancement of the human race.

"My idea of a moving picture story," says Mr. Bernstein, "is to have one that has a moral to it, is intensely interesting, and with just enough melo-drama to it to make it a little sensational—sensational enough to catch the crowd.

Men like Mr. Bernstein need help now. He needs help to carry out his refined and elevated ideas. When he is dead is not the time to hang laurels about his neck. The time to support any man of advanced ideas is when he is in his prime and giving his life and vitality to the furtherance of his ideals. To what purpose is column after column of eulogy after a man is dead. Let us stand up now beside the man who has the courage to dare, for the sake of the betterment of his race. Hooray! for the Yankee Film Company that dares for the sake of humanity!

Captain Warren Dean, 15th U. S. Cavalry, Fort Myer, Va.

Captain Dean was a welcome visitor at the Solax Company's studio this week, where he dropped in to see some of the big pictures made by his crack regiment recently by the Solax Company, and in which he once or twice appeared. He expressed himself as being highly pleased with the results and the entire productions give credit to the realities as they are at Fort Myer.

Moving Picture Theaters Preparing for Fall and Winter

Is indicated by the numerous inquiries received for new equipments, and exchange of new moving picture machines for old. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that the outlook for the coming season is very bright. Managers all over the country recognize the fact that their patrons demand the best that money can procure in the way of picture projection, and the old makeshift devices are being relegated to the junk heap. "I want a good light and a clear, steady picture." That is the prevailing note in all the inquiries.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Morris Spiers has purchased the property at 2617-18 Girard Avenue, and wil erect a moving picture theatre to cost $25,000.

West Allis, Wis.—The Douglas Land Investment Co. will erect a new moving picture theatre at 64th and Greenfield Avenues, to cost $7,500.

Milwaukee, Wis.—J. F. Reis is building a new $35,000 Butterfly Theatre at 210-14 Grand Avenue.

FROM THE OBSERVATORY

By G. F. Blaisdell

In spite of the agitation conducted by the stricter Sabbatarians against the exhibition of moving pictures on Sunday, news comes from several cities of the opening of the picture houses on that day. The city attorney of Austin, Texas, has ruled that the display of motion pictures is not a violation of the Sunday law, and the theaters accordingly opened their doors for the first time. In Tiffin, Ohio, the Common Pleas Court ruled that moving picture shows may be given legally on Sunday in that city. In Wheeling, West Va., the moving pictures were last month displayed on Sunday for the first time. The Intelligencer of that city says the proprietors of the shows seem to hold the idea that there is a popular demand for the special kind of amusement they furnish, and, in order to gratify that demand,' violation of the law is justified. The same paper "recognizes that a city of considerable size cannot be conducted along the same lines as a village or country town."

The Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Wainwright, presiding elder of the St. Louis district of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is the father of a project to establish and maintain "summer" churches the better to defeat the devil and—the moving pictures. Singularly enough, and also illogically, he bracketed with the pictures the liquor business. Among other things the doctor said was this:

"We want a continuation of the summer church, where people will find pleasure in the singing, praying and sermons instead of the moving picture shows. The Gospel is better than anything else the world can provide."

According to the point of view, men differ in their likes and dislikes. Speaking from the standpoint of a non-church-goer, the writer believes if people like to go to church, the church is the place they should go. On the other hand, if a man chooses on a hot summer evening to hie himself to Coney Island, where in some pavilion by the sea he can by turning to his left enjoy the pictures thrown on a screen and by turning to his right look out on the moonlit ocean, with its luminous, dancing waves, and at the same time enjoy the cool breezes wafted in to him, that is the place he should go—and, if he have one, to take his family.

The few ministers who find themselves sufficiently husky or inclined to remain in town during the hot months would be in a better position to estimate the size of the tree they are trying to bark up if sometimes on a Sunday evening they would drop in at a picture show. They would discover first hand that the motion picture is not necessarily an instrument of the devil; they would see portrayed dramas produced by men skilled in the art of appealing to the minds of men and women—stories with a plain moral. To be sure, comedy may be interspersed; but many a wise minister has adorned his Sunday evening talk by a bit of wit.

By all means, the ministers should attend the Sunday shows. Then, if there be on the programme anything that should not be there, the minister is in a position intelligently to criticise or to denounce the offending proprietor. A few justifiable scorings would bring the proprietor to the minister with a request for an advance supervision of his Sunday evening films. Good may result from co-operation between the pulpit and the screen. Not much good can result from unintelligent, acrimonious opposition.

The Dayton (Ohio) Journal announced recently that Airman Rodgers—and, of course, in that town it could be only in a Wright machine—would take aloft Joseph De Frenes, of London, for a circling flight over the surrounding country in general and the National Cash Register plant in particular. Mr. De Frenes while in the air will operate a moving picture camera. The negative will be forwarded to England, and the resulting films, in color, will later be shown in the daily lectures in the welfare department of the company.

It was announced some time ago that Kinemacolor had a contract for work at the N. C. R. plant. This is undoubtedly the first occasion on which a corporation has employed the aeroplane and the motion camera in conjunction for industrial purposes. Wright-Kinemacolor should make a strong combination.

James G. Wallace, chief of the Bureau of Licenses of New York City, recently directed the picture men of Coney Island to suspend their shows until they had taken out a license. These are the places where the barker in the front announces to all: "Step right inside. Seats free." When you are seated the waiter inquires: "What's yours?"

The exhibitors immediately got together at Kister's Hotel, where, by the way, Independent films are shown, and instructed a delegation to appear before the chief with the claim that as no admission is charged no license is necessary. While Mr. Wallace is thinking it over the shows are going on.

H. C. Capwell will erect in Oakland, Cal., the largest film theater on the Pacific Coast. It will be leased to Turner & Dahnken. The structure is to cost $50,000 and will seat 2,000. The building will be 150 by 75 feet, and will have double the legal number of exits.

In Essanay's "The Corporation and the Ranch" occurs an instance of "doubling up" which in these days is hardly pardonable. Anderson's excellent side-partner is shown in one scene as the president of the corporation. His disguise is thin—an imperial. He orders by telegraph an emissary sent to the ranch. In the following scene in a different garb and minus the disguise he executes the order telegraphed by the president of the corporation. This sort of work breaks the illusion. It must be admitted that as the president he looked the part. A novelty of the play is the appearance in one scene of Anderson in a tuxedo. To those who for so long have seen him in cowboy rig only the transition was interesting. The plot was clever and the execution was excellent.

Among the uses to which the camera is now being put is the illustration of operations in hospitals. Of course, such films are issued under a strict guarantee that they will be used only in hospitals and medical colleges. An accompanying catalogue describes in detail the various operations. There are also films showing, for instance, the various forms of paralysis as indicated by the gait.

Full-page articles describing some particular motion picture plant and giving illustrations of some of the more striking scenes in its product are appearing in increasing number in the Sunday newspapers. This indicates a waking-up on the part of Sunday editors to the fact that there are many people interested in pictures.

The Municipal Explosives Commission of New York City has revised the fire regulations governing the handling of films, and before submitting them to the Board of Aldermen for adoption gave a public hearing on July 27 to those interested. Attorneys representing the manufacturers and managers were present at the hearing and asked for additional time in which to consider the revisions, and an adjournment to August 10 was taken by the commission.

The proposed ordinance among other things prohibits the storing of more than 10,000 feet of films without a permit; declares that no permits shall be issued for the storage of films in buildings situated within fifty feet of the nearest wall of a school, theater or other place of public amusement or assembly; all films must be stored in an approved fireproof compartment not to exceed a thousand cubic feet in space area; all machines and apparatus for the display of motion pictures must have the approval of the fire commissioner, the cost of which certification will be $50.

Sometimes the real, old-line dramatic critic wanders into a picture show. One of these in Chicago, over the name of George Bernard Donlin—not Shaw—writing in the Record-Herald, gives the following graphic description of his impressions on entering a moving picture theater:

"The hall is long and narrow and quite innocent of windows, so that once the lights are switched off you grope in a darkness as dense as if you were buried underground. Indeed, the whole impression is then rather uncanny; the silence is funereal; you see vague heads outlined against the gloom; you might suppose (were it not for the strong smell of patchouli) that you were participating in some midnight resurrection of spirits, each sitting gravely on his own tombstone.

"But the lights are not yet shut off: You look about you. This temple of Momus is decorated in the most reckless rococo—a rococo pushed beyond the limits of decency and become bizarre, even a little insane. The stucco is tortured into arabesques, varied from panel to panel—a riot of form and color as if the several artists (each intrusted with a panel) had seized the horn of Flora and emptied it pellmell upon the plaster. From the center of the rear wall emerges, rendered in high relief, the head of a dragon in the act of extruding an electric light from its gorge. On the right is a figure of Diana, balanced across the way by a Venus whose generous amplitude could have been imagined only in Germany. Along the walls, between the panels, are set smoky plaster casts, while the mask of Comedy grins malignantly at you from the crown of the proscenium arch. Everything about you is gay with a sad, disheartening gaiety. You compose your spirits for the performance."

However, theaters of this description are not on the increase. There are many exhibitors who are paying more attention to ventilation than they are to grotesque decoration.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., August 2.—Did you ever know it to fail when a city is getting along famously, and every one is satisfied; when the town was being run in a manner that just suited at least eighty per cent of the residents, and when strife, bickering, contention and all factionalism had been relegated to the rear, that something did not have to bob up and cloud the placid and serene waters of the municipal pool?

Well, that is what Hot Springs has experienced since my last letter. We had congratulated ourselves that things "stood pat"; that all would work for the best interest of the town; that the county would attend to its business and that the city would run the city, when, lo and behold, a special election had to be held for constable and, against a field of seven Democrats, A. B. Carpenter, a well-known Republican, was elected, the Democrats so effectively splitting the vote of that party that Mr. Carpenter had fifty-seven varieties of an easy thing.

This news hasn't much to do with moving pictures or amusements, has it? Wait, Brother wait and be patient.

When Mr. Carpenter was making the race it was rumored that he would be a dangerous man to handle; that, in the vernacular of machine politics, he "would not stand hitched," but his friends laughed away that statement and said it was the Democrats who were circulating such reports.

Well, the gentleman has been in office less than a week. The other day he threw a bomb into the town by announcing that he would personally see that the gambling houses were closed for all time and that the saloons obeyed the Sunday closing law. People didn't believe it. Sort of thought the gentleman was joking, you know. However, he was very much in earnest, as witness his crusade, single handed, against the two things mentioned.

Not content with the clubhouses and the Sunday saloons he cast his eye in the direction of Whittington Park, which is the only amusement place allowed to run open on Sunday and landed there with both feet. The picture had long since been eliminated there when the managers in the city were forced to close on Sunday, but there was still running the "merry-go-round" and the "dip-the-dip," the latter being one of the greatest thrillers and breath exhausters in these parts. That wouldn't do, said Constable Carpenter, and he announced that they, too, would have to get busy and make a noise like silence. That's a paradox, I know, but that's what he inferred, just the same. Furthermore, he is seriously thinking of giving his attention to the band concerts there, I hear, and also putting a crimp in that pleasant Sunday feature.

There are some people in the city who do not take kindly to the action of the newly elected constable, as we had all agreed that things should be let alone and that the city should be given a right to run its affairs. The picture men, if ever there was a chance to run on Sunday, have now an additional handicap in the presence of the new constable to contend with, but there are some managers who are smiling broadly at his action relative to Whittington Park. It was a bone of contention with them to see the street cars packed to the doors every Sunday and realize that the people could go there and that they had to keep their houses closed. The only thing that makes us grin and bear it is the fact that Mr. Carpenter will be in office but a very short time and that at the next general election there will be a marked change in present conditions.

The picture shows continue to do a very good business, one thing being in their favor is the fact that all of them are trying to give their patrons a very good line of films. At the Lyceum, which is now under the sole management of Eddie Gavrel, a very progressive young man, many improvements have been made. Additional seats have been added and those in the rear raised. A new curtain has been installed and the pictures the past week, Trust films, were excellent. This was especially true of the picture Selig released on July 4th, "The White Medicine Man," which attracted a great deal of favorable attention and was much enjoyed. The Lyceum has also added a new curtain to its other improvements.

Lionel Lawrence gave the best presentation of a recognized drama of any company here this season. His production of "The Devil" was a masterpiece in every way. It was staged in an artistic manner; the women costumed their respective parts with handsome and costly gowns, and in the title role Mr. Lawrence proved his claim to stardom.

The Scenic has also inaugurated the giving away of prizes Saturday night through the medium of coupon drawings. For several weeks the Photo Play has been doing this every Saturday night, and last Saturday the people at both houses were lined up outside the doors and into the streets. The prize drawing at the Photo Play was a magnificent willow plume, and, take it from me, it was "some prize." The women bombarded the theater all week, paying their little dime, saving their coupons and returning Saturday night to see if they held the lucky number. It was won by a well-known young lady of the city who, when it was given her, remarked:

"Oh, wait until you see my hat Sunday."

At the Scenic Theater $10 in gold was given away to the one holding the lucky number, and that prize was won by a little barefoot youngster who had sense enough to grab the "ten" and hike for home as fast as he could go. When Manager Morrison called the number and asked if there was any one in the audience that had the duplicate, the kid yelled:

"Here, boss, dat's me; I sure enough got that number."

"What is your name, son?" asked Mr. Morrison.

"Name—don't need to know what my name is," yelled the kid, ploughing through the crowd, fearing, no doubt, that some one would take the gold piece away from him. Some managers may question the wisdom of giving away these prizes, but here in Hot Springs they have materially increased business, and, I understand, they will continue it as one of their weekly features.

Saw the Imp feature reel, "For the Queen's Honor," which the Photo Play and the Scenic played up in great shape and which was received with many favorable comments. The American also sent us a beautiful Western reel, "The Ranchman's Nerve," the photography being great and the acting right up to the minute. This firm deserves a great deal of praise for the effort they are making to produce the best of the Western subjects and they are succeeding, too.

The Great Northern reel, "The Ghost of the Vaults," was also here for a short sojourn and was much enjoyed. I always like to see the Great Northern produce something in the costume line, for they never hesitate to stage their pictures in an elaborate manner.

"Mutt and Jeff" and their matrimonial troubles packed two theaters during the week, and come now every Wednesday. Was pleased to note the improvement that has been made in the make-up of the two men impersonating these now celebrated laugh producers. The first picture I saw Mutt's nose needed "revising" and Jeff's whiskers were yelling for a barber's attention. In the reel this week the improvement seemed to have been made. The pictures are winners in this city, and, from what I hear from the managers who handle them at the Scenic and Photo Play, they are also packing houses in other parts of the country. If the historic "Hank and Lank" could see these reels they'd possibly wake up.

Essanay gave us a treat in the "Backwoodsman's Suspicion" the past week, and the reel was excellent. The scenery was exquisite and that firm score heavily by this production.

Thanhouser's reel, "Two Little Girls," delighted all the little and big girls who saw it, as well as eliciting from the masculine portion of the audience many words of praise.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

OUR LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT

Los Angeles, July 25, 1911.

Nat Goodwin has joined the ranks of the motion picture men. He will only be shown on the screen hereafter.

Mr. Goodwin has just joined the Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company as leading man and stage manager. He is a stockholder in the corporation and will be elected vice-president at the next meeting. He will receive for his services the largest salary ever paid to a motion picture actor, it is said, and in addition will receive a share of the profits. The first play which he will produce will be Clyde Fitch's Revolutionary War drama, "Nathan Hale," in which Mr. Goodwin appeared ten or fifteen years ago. It will be released in three reels and will probably be ready for exhibition September 9th.

Picture versions will be made of almost all the plays in which Goodwin appeared successfully during his long stage career. They will be released on three or more reels to the play. Among the early productions, in addition to "Nathan Hale," will be "David Garrick" "The Merchant of Venice" and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." The last named will be produced probably on the Goodwin ranch, which is located about seventeen miles from Los Angeles and close to the ocean. Santa Monica canyon will probably be the location of another studio. The canyon is a famous resort for motion picture companies, the Biograph, on their recent stay here, having taken some of their most beautiful pictures there.

Nat Goodwin, who is at present taking the leading role in the Auditorium Stock Company, was induced to join the motion picture company by Charles Giblyn, secretary of the corporation and member of the Auditorium Stock Company.

Goodwin's, however, will not be the only famous name connected with the enterprise. McKee Rankin is under contract to provide the company with two scenarios a week, the stories being of the early West. It is also probable that "The Danites" will be produced with Rankin in his original role. At present he is appearing in the Auditorium Stock Company.

Another well-known character connected with the enterprise is Miss Marjorie Rambeau, who is at present leading lady for the Auditorium Stock Company. She and her mother are both stockholders. Miss Rambeau will probably appear in a number of releases.

Although the Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company has been in operation for the past two months, little was known of it as members of the corporation refused to make themselves known. Pictures have already been made of the San Diego exposition and it was there, for the first time, a picture was made of the full military pontifical high mass of the Roman Catholic church. Bishop Conaty blessed the film, making it possible to be shown in any Catholic church the country over. For the exclusive right to make this picture, the company is said to have paid the church a sum running into four figures. The pictures were made by C. Peters and William Edwards.

The Peters camera, a new camera, is used, and a special electric light, the invention of Dillwin Daniels, who is connected with the corporation, is also part of the photographic outfit.

The officers of the company, as far as can be learned at present, are: Daniel Markowitz, president; William E. Edwards, vice-president; C. Peters, treasurer, and Charles Giblyn, secretary.

W. Nixon, president of the local motion picture men's association, resigned at a meeting held last Friday. He sent his resignation in by letter. The resignation was immediately accepted and Arthur S. Hyman elected to his place. The association reorganized and Judge Tugwell, of the Union Theater, was elected vice-president, and Mr. Kaiser, secretary. The executive committee consists of all the officers with the addition of M. Stutz.

More than a thousand persons crowded into the Salem Congregational Church last Sunday to witness the first Sunday evening picture service ever given in this city. Every nook and corner was occupied by the curious.

On the outside of the church were three large signs, of the bill-poster variety, depicting in bright colors the feature scene of each of the three films being shown. A large canvas had been erected inside and upon this the pictures were thrown. The moving picture machine was installed in a large portable box, which can be moved to any part of the church when not in use.

Between pictures brief remarks were made by the Rev. B. H. Reutepohler, pastor of the church. He declares that the pictures will be permanent and that a new set will be exhibited every Thursday and Saturday night. Association pictures are exhibited.

At the close of the entertainment a hymn was sung, but the usual hymn books were dispensed with as the words and music were thrown on the canvas by means of the camera. Considerable expense has been gone to by the church congregation in order that motion pictures might be used in the institution. Beside the actual cost of the camera, it has been necessary to comply with the city ordinance calling for "exit" signs in all theaters. There are about a dozen doors in the structure, each having been equipped with "exit" sign.

A hole has been cut in the wall where the machine box stands, and numerous incidental expenses have gone to make the scheme a high-priced one.

The films were both tragic and comic. "Athaliah, Queen of Judea," was the one tragic picture. As it was run off, Dr. Reutepohler gave a commentary, explaining each incident and scene. The other two films were comic and caused considerable laughter.

Dr. Reutepohler said last night that it is his intention to have a large majority of the films of a comic nature, though there will be a great many educational pictures. The strictest censorship in all films is to be practiced and no picture which might have an evil influence on the minds who witness it will be shown.

M. Stutz, part owner of the Shell Theater, Broadway near Sixth street, was arrested yesterday, charged with violating that section of the city ordinance which declares that all signs must have wooden backs to them. Mr. Stutz asked for time to plead in order to make arrangements with his attorney to defend him. The trial was set for July 26th. Stutz declares that he will make a test case of his trial and if necessary will appeal it to the supreme court in order to have the ordinance repealed. He declared that his signs are inside the property line and therefore do not come within the meaning of the ordinance governing signs.

A great deal has been said about the evil influence of the five cent novels of the Nick Carter type, but it has remained for Rev. Tyler Dennett of this city to start an active campaign against their sale in Los Angeles. He recently appeared before the public library board and asked them to cooperate with him. President Henry M. Newmark declared that he would be glad to join in the fight.

AMONG THE PIRATES

"As a Boy Dreams," a forthcoming Imp release, deals with the small boy who has a fondness for reading literature of the yellow back variety. The story proper is embodied in a dream in which a youth has his fondest hopes realized only to awaken and find it all a fancy—a bitter disappointment. To add to his humiliation he is put at a menial task to offset the time wasted in dreaming. The youth is discovered in a garret devouring a harrowing story of the sea in which the "long, low, rakish crafts" plow the deep, taking tribute from trading ships in the way of piracy. The lad falls asleep and dreams and his fancies take him through a series of adventures that make many of the stories told of Captain Kidd prove tame and insipid. He is mixed up in sanguinary fights in which muskets and cutlasses figure—always triumphant, and eventually marrying the ravishingly beautiful daughter of the captain on whose ship he was shanghaied. Just as he is in the zenith of his glory, with a chest literally crammed with gold coins of large denomination, he awakens and finds it was all a dream. Nothing of the sort has happened, but he is brought back to earth by his stern father, who assigns him the task of sawing wood to do penance for the time he has wasted.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS

From Our San Francisco Correspondent

The Fair site is decided. Just now nothing else matters in this cosmopolis of the West. Discussion and competition among the boosters of the three sites have been keen and acute. In fact, but yesterday Market street at lunch hour looked like a bit of Gilbert and Sullivan opera:

"And party leaders you might meet
In twos and threes on every street,
Maintaining with no little heat
Their various opinions."

Now all is changed.

With a solidarity of purpose that only the Westerner can show when you say "enjoyment" to him, every contending faction is working to the success of the 1915 event.

The direct result on the moving picture business is already apparent. I know two theaters carrying a five year lease in the Richmond district—between Harbor View and Golden Gate Park—that were offered a week ago for $2,750, and today you couldn't talk business to the owners for anything under $4,000.

A movement is on foot to erect a new theater for moving pictures in the Harbor View district which shall eclipse anything ever attempted in any American city. I am not at liberty to give any names, but they include four gentlemen who have a combined capital of over two millions. The entertainment field is new to them, but, you know, "money talks."

The report circulated some time ago that Kolb & Dill were to construct a floating theater seems to have been unfounded. At least nothing is heard of the venture. If some good river show man would do something of the sort it would pay and pay big. This is as good an opportunity for some one with the ability as there is on the coast. There is plenty of money here, too, waiting for just such an investment.

I was shown a new camera mechanism the other day—a local product—that dodges the intermittent sprocket stumbling block in an ingenious way. By means of an eccentric dog the driving sprocket is made to rotate at different speeds. When the shutter covers the aperture the film travels very rapidly, but when the exposure is being made the movement is imperceptible. Yet there is a motion, and therefore the film runs continuously but not at a uniform speed. It never actually stops, and has no "loop." I have not yet seen the device tested.

The gods be praised: the abomination of the age—the illustrated song—is dying out on the Coast. Maybe the early morning fogs, the brilliant sunshine and myriad flowers, and the indescribably beautiful moonlight nights we have out here resented the cheaply made lantern slide imitations of their charms. Anyhow, the strident tones of the damsel in the dark, who sings "Meet Me, Sweet Maggie, at the Peanut Tree" will soon be heard no more in the halls of Pacific picturedom. O let it be soon!

Romaine Fielding, Leading Man of the Solax Stock Co.

"A CRACK SHOT"

When Romaine Fielding, the leading man of the Solax Stock Company, was at Fort Myer recently, the officers of the crack 15th cavalry noticed he laid claim to being somewhat of a soldier. They arranged a little joke by getting a moving picture actor at target practice. With some mock solemnity, things were arranged. The first was a bull's-eye; the second, third and fourth were bull's-eyes. Fielding made nine out of ten and the officers opened a bottle. It then developed that Fielding, besides being identified for twenty-five years with the stage, spent three years at the Shattuck Military Academy, Faribault, Minn. He later drilled the first signal corps California ever had, saber and mounted drill, wig wag, light and heliograph signal. He has written several articles on the "Use and Abuse of Arms," and is widely known as a crack shot.

KINEMACOLOR

The remarkable pictures now being shown at the Herald Square and West End theaters, commencing this Saturday, are another tribute to the wonders of the twentieth century, namely, Kinemacolor photography, justly called the birth of photography. No such array of pictures have ever been seen of any procession, pageant or any other startling event as these films representing the forty days' festivities, covering the crowning of King George the fifth as monarch of the British Empire. These pictures having been taken by His Majesty's command, every convenience was made to suit the Kinemacolor forces in the effort to secure the best possible efforts and results of the ceremonies. These films will be placed in the sanctuary of the Tower of London, along with the pictures which will be made late in October, when George V will be made Emperor of India and ruler of the Far East, at which time the celebrated Indian procession, the Indian Durbar, will take place. The weather during the collecting of these pictures seemed determined to thwart the efforts of the Kinemacolor camera, but in spite of all obstacles the work of Kinemacolor stands triumphant. The view of the stand opposite Canning Statue on June 23d which, though packed with people, was nothing but an unbroken line of raised umbrellas will give something of an idea of the hardships necessary in securing this momentous event in the world's history. Speaking of the matter, the London Daily Telegraph says:

"It is always well to make the best of one's wares, but I think the film producer has cause for complaint when exhibitors—whether managers of music halls or otherwise—publish claims to have actually photographed the pictures which they obtain, in common with everyone else, from "the usual sources" Rival exhibitors may also have cause for complaint, especially when, as in the case of the ceremony of the unveiling of Queen Victoria Memorial, all the cameras were placed so close together that there could be practically no difference between the various films. This remark, of course, does not apply to the Kinemacolor film, the Controller of His Majesty's Household having allotted Mr. Urban positions directly opposite the steps of the Memorial, a privilege only shared by the official photographers, and so, naturally, the film shown at the Scala is very different from the black and white, not only as regards the wonderful range of colors, but as regards nearness of view.

A TRIUMPH IN SCENIC EFFECTS

A recent attempt of the Imp Company will result in something novel and interesting in the way of scenic effects and staging. The story is of the sea, the principal scenes being laid in a lighthouse. This has been attempted many times, but with varying results, failure being registered in a majority of cases. By working out the problem in a scientific manner and employing electricity the effect is realistic and "gets over," which is satisfying. The scenes on the water, of course, do not call for any ingenuity, but the wrecking of a dory on a rock and the long and perilous swim of the keeper of the light, handicapped by oilers, is a feat that few firms have ever attempted. How the light is kept revolving with the mechanism crippled furnishes a lesson in the way of duty to the government that will at once appeal to all. The sick wife drags herself to the dome and by strength that is almost superhuman does duty for the husband while he is struggling in the surf.

The Imp Company has an aviation picture well under way that will prove to be one of the most interesting films ever released. A genuine airship figures prominently in the story and the flight is thrilling in the extreme. This company has numerous innovations in the way of feature films under consideration with a number finished and almost ready for release.

"HOW THE GIRLS GOT EVEN," CHAMPION RELEASE, AUG. 16th.

TOM (INDEPENDENCE) MOORE

Tom Moore, of Washington, D. C., is a firm believer in advertising and for every $100 spent in this way, he says, it is returned to him plus 100 per cent interest. We have received the following interesting letter from him which we publish for the interest our readers will take in knowing what this enterprising Independent manager is doing in the Capital City.

Washington, D. C., Aug. 1, 1911.

The Moving Picture News,
30 West 13th Street, N. Y. C.

Gentlemen:—

Please pardon delay of acknowledgment of your kind favor of publication of my enterprise as contained in your issue of July 22d.

Since July 17th I have taken over three of Washington's best theaters, the last one being the Navy, without doubt the finest in this city and one of the most beautifully constructed theaters in the country. In the meanwhile I purchased on Saturday, July 29th, a large site here 100 x 198, same has over 19,000 square feet of ground, and have other sites under consideration upon which I may place other large houses, if I happen to get the time, as I am up to my neck in work and getting results a plenty.

My advertising campaign has crowded my theaters until it makes me weep to think I cannot accommodate the terrific mobs of people, who patiently wait outside until we can find them room on the inside. You are well posted on the policy of stupendous advertising and its results; it won't surprise you, of course, when I say I am spending over $100 a week for same, but when I spend this $100 I get it back and 100 per cent interest. On last Sunday's page "Ad" I wrote up a few daffydills, which apply to local places and merchants, which has caused much comment, a copy of which please find enclosed.

With very best wishes for the continued success of your valuable trade journal, and again thanking you for all favors, past and future, believe me,

Gratefully yours,
TOM (INDEPENDENCE) MOORE.

MANUFACTURERS' SYNOPSES of FILMS

THE RANCH GIRL"
American Release August 10th

Jack, the foreman of Bar Z Ranch, meets Alice, the new owner of the ranch, and she is welcomed by all the boys. Things run along famously at the ranch. Alice and Jack have a growing regard for each other when the clash comes.

Jack refuses the boys a leave of absence when they ask it, on account of pressing work. Mike, a tough character, and one of the boys, leads the others to ask for the holiday from Alice. She grants it and the boys ride away in open derision of Jack. Jack complains to Alice that she should not have interfered, as it is a poor showing of discipline, and she coldly informs him that it is her ranch and she will run it to suit herself.

Under these conditions Jack sees nothing left for him to do but leave her employ, which he does. He seeks work on a neighboring ranch and Alice selects Mike for her new foreman. His first official act is to discharge all the cowboys who are friendly toward Jack and replaces them with cronies of his own. The discharged boys find work under Jack and inform him how matters stand at the Bar Z. Jack rides over to expostulate with Alice, but she informs him that she is capable of taking care of herself and her own affairs, and shows him her gun. Jack, as a warning to the toughs, arranges a shooting exhibition, when they will be able to see how well Alice can handle a gun. Alice shows remarkable skill, but, when she becomes aware of Jack's purpose, she resents it and returns to the house. Mike threatens to do Jack up for his interference, but Jack calls his bluff.

Some days later Alice goes to town and, during her absence, Mike and his cronies plan to loot the house and leave with the booty. Jack rides over and while Mike engages him in conversation, one of the plotters fells him with a blow, leaving him unconscious. They tie his hands and feet and hurry to the house, where they take everything of any value and make their escape from the ranch. When Jack recovers consciousness he tries in vain to free himself, but the desperadoes have done their work well. His horse is wandering about the ranch-yard and he calls to her. The intelligent animal comes over to him, and, taking the rope that ties his hands in her teeth, soon releases him. Jack hastily tears a leaf from his note book and writes: "Boys, I am on the Alpine Trail. Come quickly and well armed. Jack." Fastening the note to the saddle-pocket, where it will be seen, he sends the horse to the ranch and starts in pursuit of the desperadoes. The horse goes directly to the ranch where Jack is employed and, when the boys find the note, they mount and hurry to Jack's assistance, taking his horse along. When they arrive on the trail Jack has already located the gang, and after a sharp conflict, they are captured and Alice's valuables recovered.

Alice, returning to her ranch, finds everything in disorder and the culprits gone. Woman-like, she sits down and cries. Jack comes to restore her property and finds her thus. Although Alice has been headstrong, she knows also when she has had enough, and she is very glad to have Jack assume charge again, this time not only of the ranch, but of herself as well.

A strong story and interesting in plot, faithful, and vivid in its portrayal of modern ranch life.

Approximate length 1,000 feet.

"THE POISONED FLUME"
American Release August 14th

After the death of her husband, Mrs. Kendall found the management of the ranch, with its attendant responsibilities, a source of worry. Her daughter, recently returned from an Eastern boarding school, could not assist her and, although the cowboys in her employ were faithful, the ranch needed an executive head.

John Morgan, a neighboring ranchman, had long cast envious eyes on the widow's increasing herd of cattle and desired to marry the daughter in order to obtain possession of her ranch. He offers to manage her affairs for her, but the widow mistrusts him and refuses his offer.

Mrs. Kendall finally secures the services of Jim Stevenson, a manly young cowboy, and he is introduced to the boys as the new manager. They take him out on the range that he may become better acquainted with his new duties. They encounter John Morgan, who is ordered off the range by the new manager.

Morgan determines to force his attentions on Hazel Kendall, and hurries to the ranch house. He finds Hazel alone and attempts to kiss her when Jim, coming to the house to report, witnesses the struggle and rescues her from the distasteful caress. Mrs. Kendall orders Morgan to leave her premises and he goes away with hatred seething in his heart.

He returns to his ranch and plans a most diabolical revenge. Mrs. Kendall's cattle obtain their water from the flume which runs through her ranch. Morgan poisons the water just above where it enters her range and thus attempts to destroy her entire herd. The cattle come to drink the poisoned water and return to the range to die. Jim discovers some of the dead cattle and, thinking an epidemic has broken out in the herd, sends one of the boys for a veterinarian. On his arrival he discovers the poison and, suspecting the water in the flume to be the cause of the trouble, he makes a test and finds his suspicions confirmed. Jim wonders who could have conceived such a dastardly plot and hurries up the flume to look for the poison. He finds the sack floating in the water and has just removed it when Morgan rides up and fires, wounding Jim in the shoulder.

The shot startles the boys grouped around the veterinarian and they hurry up to find their manager severely wounded and a fleeing horseman just disappearing over the brow of the hill. The veterinarian picks up the sack of poison and shows it to the boys. They start in pursuit of the fiend, leaving one of the boys to convey Jim to the ranch-house. They soon come within sight of Morgan and the man-hunt is on. Relentlessly they close off all means of escape and, making a wide detour, the desperate man returns to the flume and, dismounting from his horse, he climbs to the waterway and attempts to escape along the high trestle, firing at the cowboys as he runs. He is finally struck by a bullet and, with a shriek of terror, he falls into the poisoned water, the last victim of his own diabolical plot. Jim, at the ranch-house, through the careful nursing of Hazel Kendall, is soon convalescent and it is evident that the culmination will be a happy one.

"A BUM AND A BOMB" AND "HIS WIFE'S INSURANCE"
Solax Release August 9th

"A BUM AND A BOMB"

The interest recently aroused by the Cammorists' trial in Italy forms the chief topic of conversation around McGinniss' saloon. The impressionable Irishman has been greatly interested in the detailed description in the newspapers of the horrible crimes perpetrated by the Black Hand, and his mental condition easily lends itself to the doings of two frolicsome friends, who, disguised in villainous looking whiskers, call upon McGinniss and present him with a note to the effect that his saloon will be blown up by a bomb. Coincident with this some boys playing football lose their ball, which is found by the bum. He conceives the idea of trading the ball for a drink, and, strange to say, calls at McGinniss' saloon and, presenting the ball to the astonished McGinniss, demands a drink. McGiniss, horrified, and thinking at last the threat is about to be fulfilled, places before the astonished bum all sorts of good things, and meanwhile he and his friends beat a hasty retreat, leaving the bum cock of the walk.

"HIS WIFE'S INSURANCE"

Poor old Higgins, who has been noticing the sylph-like forms of other women, is much distressed at the goodly proportions of his own worthy spouse. He decides to remedy matters and his friend procures for him a bottle of Dr. Thin's Anti-Fat, which can be easily administered by putting a few drops into his wife's coffee. Coincident with this Higgins determines to renew his wife's life insurance. Hurrying from the house for this purpose, he accidentally drops from his pocket a note which had accompanied the bottle of Anti-Fat, and which is found by a policeman, who senses a possible crime. He trails Higgins to the insurance office, notes the renewal of the insurance, and then follows him home, where he sees Higgins putting the poison (?) in his wife's coffee. He is arrested, but is able to prove his innocence, and the treatment of Anti-Fat is forthwith discontinued.

"AN ENLISTED MAN'S HONOR"

Solax Release August 11th

Dora, daughter of Colonel Case, while out walking one day, is insulted by a half-breed Mexican and rescued by Jack Mann, a soldier of the Fifteenth Cavalry. They fall in love with each other and Jack studies for a commission, while Dora goes abroad. When she returns Jack has become a sergeant.

One day the troop goes on detached service and Jack is detailed as Post Exchange. The renegade Mexican discovers that Jack has the money in his possession and plans to rob him. The nefarious plot is successful and the renegades escape to their stronghold with the loot. Jack's tale is doubted and he is placed under arrest, but succeeds in escaping, and riding after his troop arrives just in time to capture the renegade. They return to the post and everything is straightened out and the young people receive the parental blessing.

"THE WHITE RED MAN"

Rex Release August 10th

Circumstantial evidence has sent more than one innocent man to the gallows, but here is a tale where an Indian—just an Indian—went through a severe physical grueling to vindicate a white man of whose condemnation he was the innocent agent.

Steve Jennings holds up a coach and escapes into the woods with the booty. He had been wounded in the fray, however, and through weakness drops part of the jewelry he had stolen. A little later an Indian passing along sees the baubles and picks them up. In making his way through the forest he steps into the bear-trap of Gene Thomas, a trapper, who lives with his wife and child in a near-by hut. The Indian extricates his foot from the trap at last, and drags his way to the hut, where Mrs. Thomas dresses the wound and treats the injured Indian. The latter, grateful for the hospitality, gives Mrs. Thomas the jewels he has found. In the meantime a posse has been seeking the bandit, and an under-sheriff comes to the Thomas hut, exhausted and spent from the fruitless pursuit, to ask for a drink of water. While the child goes for it he notices the jewelry on the table, and is at once convinced that Thomas is the outlaw. In spite of Mrs. Thomas' protestations that the jewels were given her by a grateful Indian for kindness shown him, the trapper is taken into custody in a jail several miles from the place. In a barroom in town that night the Indian hears of the arrest of Thomas and the crime with which he is charged. At once he tells the crowd that he was the one who gave Mrs. Thomas the jewels and that Thomas is innocent. He begs the men to lend him a horse so that he can ride to the jail and prove that they have condemned the wrong man, but the men only jeer at him and laugh at his story. At last, driven to desperation, the Indian determines to cover the distance to the jail by foot, in spite of his injured leg. Over the mountains he speeds, running, jumping, dragging himself along, swimming a brook, braving hardships and overcoming obstacles with the stoic fortitude which only an Indian could evidence, until he reaches the jail and corroborates the story told by Mrs. Thomas. The sheriff is so impressed with the evident seriousness of the Indian that he orders a further search made, and soon they find the body of the real outlaw in a copse near by, with the rest of the plunder on his person, dead from weakness and loss of blood—human evidence of Thomas' innocence. Thomas is at once liberated, and the grateful Indian who, to repay a kindness, went through such suffering and physical strain, in his turn earns the gratitude of the white man.

"A BOY'S BEST FRIEND"

Imp Release August 14th

James Carrington, born in a country village, is a successful broker, at the zenith of his career as a speculator. He left his birthplace as a boy and has never returned, so engrossed is he in the hustle and bustle of the Street, and the story opens at a crucial time, when his operations require all his time and attention in marshaling his forces in the big struggle to acquire a controlling interest in some stocks. There are scenes of activity in his office, where he is passing through the throes of a busy day, directing his army of assistants. He is tired and weary of it all, satiated with the excitement of outwitting his competitors.

He receives a letter from his old home announcing the illness of his mother. Mother—the name brings fond remembrances to his fagged brain. He has not seen her for years—longer than he cares to attempt to remember, and he reflects. He is brought back to the sordid things of the world by the announcement that his grand coup—his master stroke to amass a huge fortune—is about to be pulled off, as the time is opportune. He receives the news in a matter of fact way, his mind reverting to his childhood days and—his mother.

He leaves the office, being reminded that the morrow will be the critical time—when he will crush his business enemies and be a power in the street, his name on every lip, as the clever financier who has succeeded.

He goes to his apartments, not interested in business, his thoughts constantly reverting to his youth. Seated by the open grate, he sees in fancy his past life. He dreams—and dreams of his mother. His life passes before him in a complete panorama. A child in arms; a boy at school; his youthful indiscretions; his early manhood, with his mother his best friend and companion, shielding him from the wrath of his father, coming to his rescue and paying his gambling debts; comforting him in sickness and in health. He sees it all, the mother in her declining years, wasted by sickness, beckoning him to come to her. He awakes with a start, summons his man, and, ignoring the important business of the morrow—forgetting everything else but his mother—he hastily packs a few belongings, and hastens out after telephoning his business partner and explaining that he will not be at his post the next day. There is a heated conversation, but Carrington has decided. He will go, although sacrificing a fortune. He sends a telegram to his mother and quickly follows.

The story closes with the mother, ill in bed, anxiously awaiting the coming of her boy. He arrives and is clasped in her arms.

"BEHIND THE TIMES"

"Imp" Release August 17th

For many years Rev. David Ellis has been pastor of the congregation of a village church. He has been loved by his flock and has seen it grow from a small number to a flourishing pastorate. The aged preacher has not kept pace with the times and the fact is noted by the members of one of the women's societies. The president, a society woman, has her ideas, and decides that the old preacher should be replaced by a younger man—an up-to-date minister. To think is to act, and at the next meeting of the society she broaches the subject and finds willing listeners. It is decided to retire the old pastor on a pension and install his successor. The women are active, and despite a few feeble protests, the majority rules.

Rev. Charles Montgomery arrives and the news is broken to Dominie Ellis at his home. He is broken-hearted and hurt, but bows to the will of his flock, resigned to his humiliation. The new minister is young, handsome, debonair and a favorite with the women. His first sermon is listened to with interest, and at the close he is congratulated by the gushing women and rather ignored by the men. The old pastor is there and he wends his way out with his faithful wife, unobserved—forgotten.

Reverend Ellis has one staunch friend, a sweet young girl of the village, and her mother becomes ill. The mother begs her to call the minister. The daughter meets the Reverend Mr. Montgomery as he is about to go motoring and implores him to go to her home. He has no time for calling on his parishioners and steps into his car and is bowled away.

The girl goes to the old minister and tells him of the illness of her mother. Stopping to pluck a flower, he goes with her and sits by the bedside of the mother.

The child of the lady president of the church society is stricken with diphtheria and is near death. The young minister is summoned and loses no time in calling at the home of his patroness, but when he sees the notice of the contagious disease he declines to enter the house and slinks away, pleading another engagement. The parents are grief-stricken, but the village girl, the friend of the old pastor, takes in the situation, and goes to him, begging him to call at the house of the woman who was responsible for his humiliation. It is too much for the good wife and she advises him not to go. The girl explains that the young minister will not take the risk of contagion. David Ellis, the true Christian, leader of the flock for years, puts on his hat and goes.

His coming is a surprise to the woman of fashion, but he takes matters in hand, kneels by the bedside of the child and prays—long and earnestly. His supplication is heard, the child revives, much stronger. The mother starts to thank him and he moves away, saying, "It was God's will."

The next Sunday the Reverend David Ellis occupies the pulpit and at the close of the sermon he is surrounded by the congregation and warmly congratulated. Behind the time, perhaps, the true worth of the man is discovered.

"NOBODY LOVES A FAT WOMAN"

Thanhouser Release August 15th

Jack Darcy finds that it is hard to make a living in a great city, no matter what certain rich men may say, and is naturally overjoyed to receive word that he had inherited $50,000, left by a great uncle, who has severely neglected him in life. There is only one unpleasant string attached to the gift. To win it Jack must, within one year, wed the daughter of the uncle's friend, a woman he has never met.

But that condition does not seem so terrible until Jack has met the lady fair. She has a kind face, but she looks like twins. Jack makes a great hit with her, she causes Jack an awful shock. He would have given up the task at once, had it not been for the lawyer, who tells him he has a year to think it over, and not to be hasty. Also, one never can tell what a woman will look like in a year, and this lady fair may look better, as it is certain that any change will be an improvement. So Jack, while not commiting himself, decides to suspend judgment.

The daughter of the uncle's friend does the best she knows how to train down. She wants to be a slim athlete, and goes through torturing training without result.

The lawyer, with an amiable desire to get Jack accustomed to the woman, invites both to a house party at his seaside home, where Jack decides to stop being an heir. He sees a young girl who has all the grace that he admires in a woman. She is an excellent swimmer, too, and when in a race she easily defeats Jack and several other men, he realizes that even $50,000 is not much money under certain circumstances. And this belief is intensified when he sees the fat girl in a bathing suit, and nearly dies of exhaustion on trying to rescue her in deep water.

He goes to the lawyer, and firmly informs him that he does not want the money, it can go to charity or any other old thing. The lawyer questions him and finds that his mind is made up. Then he produces a codicil to the uncle's will, to be in force only if the young man refuses to marry the girl. In that case, the uncle says, he admires the boy's manly spirit, applauds him for his refusal to accept dictation, and—doubles the legacy.

All of which shows that sometimes it pays not to be mercenary, and that virtue is occasionally well paid. But as nobody loves a fat woman, the outcome of the matter did not exactly please the daughter of the friend of Jack's great uncle.

THE TRAIN DISPATCHER

Thanhouser Release August 18th

The R., T. & D. Railroad engages a new General Manager, who, while he has plenty of ability, also has some decided prejudices. One is that women have no business in the service of a railroad, and the first thing he does after being installed is to notify the women that their services are no longer required. One of the victims, because of her faithfulness and excellent service, has risen to the position of train dispatcher, but she goes like the rest of her sex.

The girl lives in a little country town, and is the sole support of her crippled little brother. Losing her position so unjustly was a severe blow to her, but she bravely made the best of it, and hid her troubles from the child.

The boy was taken sick one night, and his sister, alone with him in the house, started out over the country road to get a doctor. On her way she crossed the railroad track, and, to her horror, saw that there had been a washout. Knowing the train time as she did, she was aware that the night express would be along shortly and unless it was halted there would be terrible loss of life.

The train was coming from the opposite side of the abyss, so she could not flag it. There was no station near, and no telephone that could be reached in time to prevent the catastrophe. But the girl was resourceful, climbed a telegraph pole, and with a makeshift apparatus called up division headquarters.

Even then her heroism would have been of no avail had it not been for a lucky accident. The despatcher who took the girl's place was fond of liquor, and on this night was in a drunken slumber. He did not hear the call, and every moment increased the danger.

But the general manager happened to be in his office. He had seen his mother off on that train and then returned to his desk to attend to some important business. He heard the insistent call in the next room, and, being a railroad man, went in to investigate.

There he found the operator asleep at his post and took the message himself. It came in time for him to hold the train, but he realized that he had saved the train's passengers and the mother he dearly loved only by a narrow margin. Also that the one person deserving of credit was the girl he had discharged, simply because she was a woman.

The manager made amends the best he could. He restored the girl to her old position at an increased salary, and as gratitude is often akin to love (and with more reason than pity), there is reason to believe that the despatcher lost her job again, but this time to take a life position in happy surroundings.

"A GOOD-NATURED MAN"

Yankee Release August 14th

The hero of this screamingly funny comedy possesses the patience of Job and the good nature of a saint. He goes through a series of mishaps that would sour the temper of the best natured, but in spite of all he retains his good nature. The mishaps begin as he leaves his home with a broad grin upon his good-natured face. Mingling with a lot of schoolboys who are playing football he becomes the butt of their overflowing spirits and is buffeted about as though he were a football; passing a partly finished building he is just in time to receive a load of brick upon his head which a careless laborer has permitted to slip from his shoulders; passing along the highway he is run into by a huckster with a cart load of overripe bananas and falls into the cart; smiling in his good-natured way upon a handsome young woman he receives a thrashing at the hands of her escort, who mistakes him for a flirt; while enjoying the river breezes from a pavilion on the waterfront he is thrown into the water by a boisterous rowdy; while seated upon the railing of a landing dock he is again thrown into the river and when pulled from the water is given up by his rescuers for dead. They place him upon a stretcher and carry him to his home. As his wife falls prostrated upon his body, to the surprise of all, he rises to a sitting posture and his good-natured grin put all into good humor again.

"A CHILDREN'S PARADISE"

During the recent frightful hot spell many a thought was given to the poverty stricken infants of our great cities, among whom the death rate during the summer months is appalling. Were it not for the fresh-air homes supported by newspapers and a charitable public, very few of the little ones in the congested districts would survive the hot summer months.

In our picture of the "Children's Paradise" a splendid opportunity is given to see the life these "babies of the poor" lead daily in one of the largest fresh-air homes in the world. Mt. Lawn is situated at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, New York, and was founded by Dr. Louis Klopsch in 1895. The home occupies thirty-five acres of beautiful woodland and is indeed a veritable paradise for the little ones who never see a blade of grass grow or can fill their little lungs with God's fresh air. Three thousand starved babies are made happy and healthy by a two weeks' vacation when they receive plenty to eat and can breathe God's pure air. The home is supported by voluntary contributions and costs to maintain $20,000 per year.

"HER FATHER'S SECRETARY"

Yankee Release August 18th

It often occurs that a ne'er-do-well in his own home, pampered and spoiled by a doting father and mother, will often show his true metal when thrown upon his own resources.

Dick Blair, the idle son of millionaire parents, being born with a "silver spoon in his mouth," like many another of the "idle rich" abuses his opportunities and becomes in early manhood a dissipated man about town. In spite of repeated warnings and also threats of disinheritance, he continues in the "pace that kills" until his father, realizing that unless the boy is thrown upon his own resources and made to feel actual want, he would go to an early grave, finally drives him from the home that had sheltered him since childhood, and orders him to make his own way in the world.

"Blood will tell." The energy, ambition and perseverance that made his father a colossal figure in the financial world was duly inherited by the son, but lay dormant during his pampered days, and, when thrown upon his own resources, these splendid qualities asserted themselves and Dick becomes the "son of his father."

His new life begins when he saves from drowning the daughter of a famous banker and modestly disappears after the heroic deed. In answering an application for a private secretary, he finds his employer to be the father of the girl whom he had saved from drowning. The daughter of the banker recognizes Dick as her rescuer and the banker takes a special interest in him. Dick's sterling qualities eventually win him a junior partnership with his employer and also the hand of the girl whom he rescued from a watery grave.

Proud of his wife and the position in life he has attained, he calls upon his father and a happy reconciliation follows.

"THE THREE CALLS"

Champion Release August 14th

When Paul White gave up his school of cadets and went to the front, it wounded the heart, for the time being at least, of his little sweetheart, Mabel Thompson. But, being a true Southern girl, she became resigned to her fate.

Soon Paul was placed in charge of a signal corps. One day his sweetheart came with her father, a bluff old major, on a visit. During this visit, Paul explained some of the mysteries of heliographing or signaling mirrors, using her own little pocket mirror by way of demonstration. It was a pretty scene between teacher and pupil, and love was the lesson.

But one day, in the midst of success, a catastrophe worse than death overtook our hero. The explosion of a shell deprived him, not of life, but what we regard as more precious, the mind. No more did he lead his men in the resounding charge and din of battle, but utterly oblivious to all his surroundings his days went by until the war was over.

Through it all, and ever by his side, stood the loyal little girl. The doctor, an eminent specialist, had given up all hope for his recovery. Overcome by her emotion, she wept bitterly, and then recovering herself she had recourse to her mirror that she might view her face and remove the tears. But something startling occurred. The flash of the mirror in the sunlight caught the eye of the stricken youth, and, like a beam of light, a ray of reason enters his mind.

The doctor had already said that only could some great or momentous occurrence restore that faded mind. Thus came a great hope to Mabel, for an idea struck her. It was simply this: to reenact the scene in which Paul had participated when the calamity befell him. This was done—the same spot was chosen—the men in arms again donned the gray. The mimic warfare was at its height—then suddenly the blessed reason was restored to him. They led him away and complete recovery rapidly followed. And the great happiness of knowing and enjoying the love of one of the best and truest of women was his once more.

"HOW THE GIRLS GOT EVEN"

Champion Release August 16th

Three young men plan to play a practical joke on their girl friends whom they are calling on in a beautiful country village. The girls have protested against the imputation cast upon their sex, as regards a fear on their part for a mouse. The whole thing, they declared, was a simple fabrication of the masculine mind, the mind of mere man.

The boys and girls were in the midst of a quiet evening and the latter unsuspecting. Suddenly a wild scream was emitted from a girl's lips, and she bounded on the back of an arm chair. Instantly, the cause of her dire apprehension had become known, and the other two girls followed her example, both as to loud cries and gymnastic leaps. And the cause of all was a wee mouse; but the real fun was that the mouse wasn't real. It was a mere mechanical toy pulled across the floor by one of those horrid boys, who now lay doubled up with laughter at the expense of the girls, who now felt their humiliation. The girls now resolved to get even.

The next day each young man received a challenge, daring him to go to a certain haunted house. The girls meanwhile had preceded them, and gathered together some ancient ghost paraphernalia. Soon the three boys came along, armed to the teeth (they were husky cowboys) with some cards and a bottle of "courage." Just as they are settled down to a nice game of seven-up, "bang" one of them gets it on the side of the head. He leaped to his feet with drawn gun, but nowhere can he see where the blow came from, for the door behind him was locked. This got the "brave fellow's" nerve, and, when huge chairs rattled, and tree stumps thumped about, they vigorously attacked their bottle of "courage."

The climax was reached when white robed figures appeared. With wild yells, they clung to each other, fired their guns, and performed every stunt that brave men are not supposed to, and they finally collapsed with exhaustion.

In the next room, the girls were hysterical with laughter. Then they burst in on the "brave" young men, and, when they later collected their wits, they rose to their feet and treated each other to a kicking match, and made their departure, while the girls hug the caretaker for the service he rendered them.

"THE MOTHER'S MARK"

Great Northern Release August 12th

A newly married wife is in great grief at the death of her only child. One day she and her husband call at a cottage for refreshment during a walk and there see a child whose features bring back to the mother's recollection the child she has lost. The peasant woman is persuaded to allow the visitors to adopt the child, first making a tattoo mark on its arm. Twenty years elapse, the peasant woman dies, and one of her daughters by chance gets a situation in the house where her adopted brother is living with his foster parents. There has been staying in the cottage home another brother, who is the scapegrace of the family. He enters the house where his sister is employed for burglarious purposes. His brother whom he does not know has just come in and grapples with the intruder. The burglar is just about to shoot when he sees the mark on the other man's arm, and knows that they must be brothers. Gratitude that he has been saved from committing fratricide overcomes him, and the brothers embrace, after which there is a general reconciliation.

"TEDDY TRAINED BY HIS MOTHER"

This is an unusual film showing the antics of a baby bear born in captivity. The care of the she bear for her offspring is remarkable. The sagacious creature teaches the youngster to swim by entering the water herself and encouraging the cub to come in, too. Similarly, by example, she teaches the cub various other "stunts."

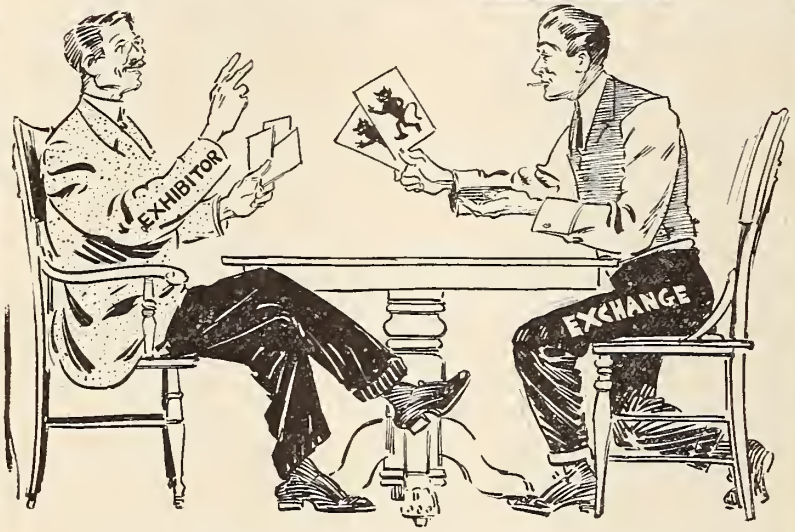
"It's no Gamble when you draw IMPS"



You don't have to bluff to get a full house when you draw Imps. You've got a dead sure thing. Even the children know that they'll enjoy the show when you advertise "Imp Today." And down in your heart you know, know, know that Imps are in a class by themselves. That being the case, why don't you see that you get two Imps every week? For instance, here's a pair of Imps that you ought to get if you have to fight for them:—

"A BOY'S BEST FRIEND"

Read the synopsis of this film elsewhere in this issue and then imagine what a powerful picture is possible with Imp acting, Imp staging, Imp expertness back of it. This release will appeal to everybody! Ready August 14th. (Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

"BEHIND THE TIMES"

This is another Imp melodrama of the highest type. No one can pick a flaw in it. It teaches a lesson, tells a heart story and leaves a good taste in the mouth. Go after it with all your might! Begin today! Ready August 17th. (Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

WARNING TO DUPERS!

Every Imp Film is now copyrighted, and any duping or infringing will be prosecuted immediately and vigorously. This is fair warning. Hands off!

DON'T FORGET TO GET THE IMP SPECIAL RELEASE, "ELKS' NATIONAL CONVENTION AT ATLANTIC CITY." ASK YOUR EXCHANGE FOR IT!

OUT IN IOWA

in the city of Burlington, Mr. J. H. Ewing sat down and wrote: "Those Imp pictures are certainly beautiful. Please send some more. They will be gladly received!" I'll bet I get more complimentary letters than any exchange man in the business. It's a healthy condition. Why don't you get some of it, Mr. Exhibitor? Write today!

IT'S REALLY FUNNY

TO WATCH THE TACTICS RESORTED TO BY THE TRUST ENDEAVORING TO CHECK THE VERY LARGE FALLING OFF OF THEIR BUSINESS AND ITS EFFORTS TO REGAIN PART OF IT BY BRINGING SUITS AGAINST INDEPENDENT EXHIBITORS upon the Latham Loop Patent No. 707934 and the Pross Patent No. 722382 (for the Pross Revolving Shutters), thus trying to scare and intimidate EXHIBITORS INTO SIGNING long term contracts with it to use only Trust films.

THERE IS NOTHING IN THESE SUITS that need alarm any exhibitor. The Trust gains no legal advantage whatever from beginning these numerous suits or from prosecuting them. There is already a suit pending on the Latham Loop Patent, in which testimony is being taken and which suit we are defending. We have every reason to expect a decision in our favor in this suit, and that will conclusively settle all of the suits now brought or being brought.

is a story of the higher type that gives refinement and tone to your programme. It deals with the vengeance that was sought by a sea captain whose intemperance caused the loss of his ship and of the lives of his crew—except his mate. On the mate's testimony, the captain is given a prison sentence. At the expiration of his term, he seeks to "square" himself with the mate. But here his Maker steps in, through an earthly delegate, and reminds him that he has another, a better, world to strive to attain. No. 239. Code Word, Cross.

THE QUESTION OF PATENTS

We have frequently in the columns of the Moving Picture News expressed our opinion concerning the invalidity of the various patents, such as the Latham loop, the Pross shutter, sprocket and perforated film.

Just at the present juncture it may be wise to go back to some of our old arguments, as we said at the banquet of the National Exhibitors' Association. We have been connected directly, and indirectly, with this industry, for a period of twenty-two years.

It was in the year 1889 we first made the acquaintance of our friend W. Friese-Greene and saw the first motion picture produced in a projecting machine, which used a shutter and perforated film using a loop. We traveled very extensively, commencing round '92, with the machine in England, projecting all the pictures that were in use and made at that time. The machine used the same devices that were patented in America in 1902 and 1905, thus showing the flimsy claims on the various patents of projecting machines and the fallacy of prosecuting innocent exhibitors.

We have pointed out in previous issues facts like these, over and over again, until we begin to think our readers will be tired of the reiteration of such well-known facts and ideas. Still as the mind of the American is so plastic that many impressions very quickly fade, so that "lest we forget" we again bring these matters before our readers with a view of inspiring them with some courage to fight the bitter antagonism of the Patents Company towards a great and ever-growing industry.

This company is indeed "The dog in the manger," it cannot eat the hay, and will not let the cow eat it. In other words, it is absolutely impossible for the Patents Company and its licensees to supply the trade with good film in sufficient quantities to fill the demand of the exhibitor and his patrons. We therefore claim, as we always have done, an open field in which it shall be the strict absolute merit of the project that shall be taken as a criterion, and subject to the full approval of sincere praise.

To show our readers that we are fully conversant with the subject at issue, we herewith reproduce, from the actual machine, three cuts of a machine built in the fall of 1892 and spring of 1893.

This machine was operated in public as originally constructed in the years '93 and '94. It will be observed by mechanics that the shutter is fixed in place and the machine is so constructed that the loop was absolutely necessary. Before it could be used otherwise it would have been rapidly broken.

This machine, as can be observed, had originally wood for the sprocket wheels, in which were driven German silver pins. These sprockets were taken out and brass sprockets were added in 1895 and were used, until July, 1897. This machine was in constant use, giving exhibitions in the city of New York and within a distance of 300 to 400 miles from the city.

As far as we can gather the information, this was the second machine ever put out. To those whom we showed the machine, nothing but expressions of surprise and admiration emanated. They were high in their praise, they wanted to buy it, and take it right away, but to every one our reply was "No, thank you, this is not for sale." It is too valuable to sell and almost too valuable to keep. But, nevertheless, this machine can be seen by all interested parties, and we may say the machine is for sale if the proper price is offered for it, and so that burglars may not break in our office, we will say the machine is in a place where sneaks cannot break in and take it.

This machine shows an open film winder from which the film descended into a box, basket, or other receptacle. Hundreds of exhibitions were given, and yet not so much as a thought of danger was given to it.

We have had very interesting conversations with some of the old timers who are available as witnesses and who saw and handled this machine in '92-3-4 and 5.

EXHIBITORS

Now that the National Convention is a matter of history, we can look back and try to learn a lesson therefrom. The first point we want to contradict, from the numerous press reports that went about, is on referring to the report that it will be the object of the League to increase fees from 5 to 10 cents admission. This is not so, it is still left to each individual exhibitor to make his own charges.

The next point of great value to motion picture men was the suggestion to drop vaudeville from the programme of the motion picture houses. We think the elimination of this will add very much to the respectability of the patrons visiting the various exhibitions. It was the keystone of Mr. Neff's address—"we are going to fight," said he, "to keep vaudeville out of the moving picture show houses and moving pictures out of vaudeville. We think moving pictures should stand out as a separate form of entertainment, and do not think that the mixing in of vaudeville is necessary to make moving pictures a profitable investment." We fully agree with Mr. Neff in these remarks, and also with the following, in which he said, "We want moving pictures perfected to the point where pictures could be shown in daylight. This could easily be accomplished by showing pictures on a special prepared surface, and the house could be well lighted and still the pictures could be shown clearly and distinctly." Another remark should stand out in bold letters, and should be well digested by every manufacturer of film in the country. He said, "We exhibitors want a greater variety of pictures. We are going to attempt to bring about an adjustment between Trust and Independent film makers, so that the exhibitor may use both kinds instead of one as at the present time." These are very moot questions, and to the latter remarks we can say Amen! Amen! This is a consummation devotedly to be wished, and as we have expressed in our columns before, it would do our heart good to see each faction of this great and growing industry shake hands and bury the hatchet of warfare and start a campign for the good only of Nickelodia.

Another question touched upon in the course of conversation was the illustrated song "Bugbear." Different opinions were expressed as to the value of this item on the programme. We want to go on record and say, the elimination of this item would add to the value of the show very considerably. It is so rare to see a good song illustrated and properly posed, and almost impossible to find a real good colored slide. We therefore think that if the slide item is clipped from the bill it will be to the advantage of the houses doing it. Take as an argument, people looking at the pictures are spell bound, not a movement can be seen in the house. Immediately the song slide item is flashed on the screen, what is the result? One-half to two-thirds of the audience get up and walk out. We feel certain that if a good song was rendered by an artist or a good lecture given in place of these song slides, it would add considerable to the coffers of the exhibitors.

A still more important lesson to be learned from the convention is that of insurance. We fully endorse the policy of the convention in forming an insurance company exclusively for exhibitors, and when we consider the fact that for the first six months of this year the amount of fires accurring in that period was in round figures $125,000,000, and making our argument more secure we reproduce from the "New York Tribune the followi ig article:

AN AMERICAN FAILING

Fire losses in the United States and Canada for the first six months of 1911 aggregated $129,000,000 —an increase of $30,000,000 over the total for the corresponding period in 1910. American prodigality in feeding the flames is apparently increasing rather than diminishing, in spite of agitation for better building laws and more effective fire protection. The worst thing about the increase is that it imposes new burdens not shown by the mere total of property destroyed. A heavier outlay on the part of the insurance companies necessitates a raising of insurance rates; and that added cost falls on the public generally, for every renter has to pay his share of the landlord's insurance. Moreover, greater fire destruction calls for more expensive protective equipment. It has been estimated that the loss by fire in the United States in 1907 amounted to $215,000,000. But the excess cost of premiums over insurance paid out, of fire departments and of waterworks service was $241,000,000, making a grand total of $456,000,000 sunk in fighting fire.

Statistics collected in Europe by American Consuls, just made public by the State Department, show that we lag far behind European nations in the important art of combating one of the great destructive forces of nature. In five classes of European cities, arranged according to population, the per capita fire loss in 1907 varied from 65 cents in cities of more than 300,000 population to $1.67 in cities of from 50,000 to 100,000. But in this country the figures varied from $2.14 to $3.28. Our average annual fire loss is more than $2.50 per capita, while in Austria the average is 29 cents, in Denmark 26, in France 30, in Germany 49, in Switzerland 30 and in Italy 12.

The American instinct for economic invention seems to have failed entirely in dealing with one of the greatest sources of economic waste. It is far from creditable to our boasted practicality as a nation that we are willing to burn up each year five to twenty times as much property as is burned up by our economic rivals abroad.

Noting the above figures we have it on good authority that the total fire losses from the motion picture industry are only one per cent of five per cent of the total. Will some of our actuary readers give us the correct figures showing the actual loss to Cinematography? On the whole we think the exhibitors have inaugurated a great forward movement, and, as we remarked at the banquet, we fell sure that they have started on the line of prosperity and success.

Dear Sir:—I beg to reply to your letter of July 17th addressed to his Honor the Mayor. You state in your letter that while Italian and Dutch subjects can procure moving picture licenses, other nationalities are not so favored. This Department has recently been advised by the Corporation Counsel that the citizenship requirement is no longer in force.

Yours truly,
J. L. PULTZ, Secretary.

The above letter speaks for itself, and we now trust operators will be able to again get licenses and procure work.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MOTION PICTURE

By Robert Grau

The question as to who invented motion photography is one that may never be correctly recorded; in all likelihood the moving pictures always were.

Since the discovery of photography operators in that field have known that plates contained the motion and color value of the objects exposed to the camera. To reproduce this motion and also the various colors was the problem that confronted all interested in the art of photography.

Probably the man who can claim the greatest credit for the conquest of the motion picture, is Edward Muybridge, of Oakland, California, who at the instigation of Governor Leland Stanford of that state, made countless pictures of the governor's celebrated trotter, Occident, the first horse to trot a mile in 2 minutes and 20 seconds west of the Rocky Mountains. Occident was the pride of the governor's heart, and he engaged Muybridge to photograph him in every conceivable size and shape.

In making a series of snap shots of the horse's actions, Muybridge was able to show the horse's motion. In order to satisfy his ambitious employer, Muybridge evolved a novel scheme of placing a number of cameras, covering at least one-tenth of a mile. From these cameras he stretched silk threads across the track at about the height of the trotter's knee; these threads being broken, each one made a distinct picture of the horse, and by putting them together and riffling from the thumb, the horse could be seen in actual motion.

In 1885 (almost a decade before the Cinematographe was revealed at Keith's Union Square Theater) Muybridge sailed for England, and there, affiliating himself with a half dozen others, evolved the first moving picture camera. A year later some of these cameras reached this country. In 1887 the Patent Office at Washington commenced to receive applications from any number of inventors for moving picture apparatus, both for taking and projecting purposes.

In 1890, the Edison Company came into possession of the Lathem Eidoloscope, and started in the moving picture movement. In 1892 they were followed in the field by the Biograph, invented by Herman Casler, of Canastota, N. Y., and this was expected to prove an innovation in that their pictures were taken on a film 2 x 2⅞ inches in height and width, which was supposed to give them a decided advantage and produce a much better picture. This, however, did not prove to be the case, as the projecting machine magnified the film to what they call reckline or standard size, namely, 1 inch square, the clearness of the picture depending on the sharpness of the negative.

About this time, during the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893, the Lumière Company, of Lyons, France, came to this country with both a camera and a projecting machine, which were shown at the World's Fair. At this time, and, in fact, for several years after the motion pictures appeared to be more or less a fad. As a matter of fact, outside of the novelty there did not seem to be any great commercial market for the pictures. This state of affairs went along for some two or two years, until the attention of the vaudeville managers was drawn to the possibility of their exhibition as a vaudeville attraction.

B. F. Keith in the East and J. J. Murdock in the West were the pioneers in placing the moving pictures actively before the public. At that time there only existed in America the Edison and Biograph Companies which were engaged in litigation with the hope of exterminating each other.

In 1896 the vaudeville managers found it necessary to look for more manufacturers, and this resulted in Messrs. Selig and Spoor starting the first American motion picture plant for the manufacture of films in Chicago.

Nothing of great moment occurred after this, until 1904, when a number of European manufacturers came over to this side to dispose of their wares. Then was started the guerrilla warfare! Subjects were no sooner on the market than they were immediately duplicated. This was not confined to any particular set of men or manufacturers, but was quite general in the industry itself, until it reached a point where it was practically impossible to make a subject without having it duplicated within 24 hours. This continued from 1904 to 1906, when it became apparent to the leading figures in the film field that something must be done.

From this state of affairs grew what is now known as the Motion Picture Patents Company, founded June 10th, 1908, consisting of the combined American manufacturers then as follows: the Edison, Biograph, Vitagraph, Lubin of Philadelphia, Kalem of New York, Essanay and Selig Companies of Chicago, and George Kleine, of Chicago, who controlled the output or product of Urban-Eclipse, and Gaumont, two foreign concerns of large capacity.

To these was added the Pathé Frères of Paris; this combination had so fixed matters that they absolutely controlled the American film market, and had so regulated matters, they thought, as to make it impossible for any other European manufacturers to obtain a foothold in this country.

"The Trust," for such it was, began to exercise undue strictures on the exhibitor, even going so far as to demand that no one be allowed to combine moving pictures with vaudeville, and they intended not to furnish pictures to any one presenting vaudeville acts.

With this radical state of affairs it became necessary for the united vaudeville interests to adopt measurers for self protection, 98% of the entire motion picture business of this country was at this time vested in the Patents Company, so that the vaudeville managers were forced to action; they selected J. J. Murdock to look after their welfare. He formed the International Producing Company within 48 hours after the Patents Company had started, probably the quickest action for so large an enterprise ever recorded. Before the ink on the signatures was dry, the wires under the ocean were alive with messages from Murdock that resulted in twenty-eight of Europe's best film manufacturers combining, and their representatives were on the seas with films bound for these shores.

Like a bolt from a clear sky came the announcement in the trade journals of Chicago to the effect that the International Producing Company was ready to release 20 reels or more, if the demand warranted it every week. Thus was evolved at one bound an independent market on a par with the Patents Company, as far as the amount of films released is concerned. These independents have survived to this day, growing in strength and immensity until they too have combined into a sort of rival trust, entitled the Motion Picture Sales Company. It is with these two combinations that all in the field have to deal.

Large fortunes have been made in the motion picture field by comparatively few, and the number who have met disaster, is legion! In no other legitimate business can money be lost so quickly or in larger amounts.

Thomas A. Edison is paid a royalty of one-half a cent a foot for every foot of raw material, or film, ordered of the Eastern Kodak Company which manufactures all of the raw material for the Patents Company. This brings to "the wizard" of Menlo Park from this one source a revenue of about a half million dollars a year.

Outside of Edison moderate fortunes were made in the early days of the craze by nearly all of the manufacturers, as well as the exhibitors, but the competition with the exhibitor became so fierce that their fortunes were soon wiped out or greatly reduced. and to-day, if the truth be recorded, but few of the moving picture theaters make money. It is true that Marcus Loew became a rich man in five years, and now controls forty theaters, many of which he owns, but even he will admit that the biggest profits came when he augmented the vaudeville phase of his programmes.

The manufacturers who started in the early stage and who now form the nucleus of the Patents Company, have all made fortunes and are even now wealthy men, while some of these for a period of three years made between $100,000 and $200,000 a year. It is a question if any of these manufacturers can show earnings in excess of $75,000 a year to-day.

As for the Independents, none can be called wealthy, and only four or five of these make any money at all.

The Patents Company assesses every exhibitor two dollars a week for each machine used by them; this tax is divided between the Edison and Biograph Companies and constitutes an enormous income and one that has been resented by the Independents who are not forced to meet any such demand.

The Patents Company consists of Messrs. Edison, Dyer, Kennedy, Rock, Smith, Blackton, Baldwin, Marvin, Casler, the Loper Estate, Marion, Long, Kleine, Lubin, Meliès, Spoor, and Anderson and Selig. These gentlemen are all fairly wealthy, none save Edison is a millionaire, though all are rated between $100,000 and $500,000, all earned in the first three years of the craze.

J. J. Murdock, who really has been the most vital figure in the expansion of the entire industry, became so ill a few years ago that his retirement was forced, and all of his vast interests disposed of. He has now recovered, and in resuming activity has brought about the formation of a third combination in the newly organized Kinemacolor Company, a six million dollar corporation holding the Urban-Eclipse patents and which is about to introduce in this country the Kinemacolor pictures with the expectation of thoroughly revolutionizing the moving picture business. The first of these offerings constituting the Coronation Ceremonies in England are now arriving in this country, and their advent has already caused the greatest upheaval in the industry itself; in fact, the color pictures are expected to prove so superior to all previous efforts that an entirely new craze is looked for.

DUBIOUS PROSPECTS

Many of our readers are receiving telegrams and letters asking them to take stock in some brokers prospecting of the film market. Others (manufacturers) are being requested to join an organization to promote a series of poor producers and outcast manufacturers, among whom are a few old time dupers and absolute failures, men who have lost the respect of the majority of exhibitors and exchanges. These are being exploited with a view to form a quarrelsome faction and to breed dissension among well satisfied exchangemen. Several meetings have been held, and to induce others to join the names of good men in the business are quoted, among others, that of A. W. Leggit. On asking for facts from Mr. Leggit, he informed us that he was working only for his own organization or company and that the use of his name is altogether unauthorized in attempting to impose upon the trade by such methods as this new organization is trying to do. Three or four shady brokers and ex-brokers are trying to get hold of good money from easy marks, and if our readers will be advised they will keep the dollars in their own pockets where it is of some use to them unless they have so much they want to throw it away. We understand also that some wily promoters are trying to start an insurance brokerage. Our readers had better wait and see what sort of a scheme the National League of Exhibitors put forward before investing in "Will-o'-the-wisps."

The first National Convention of the Exhibitors League held at Cleveland, the first three days of this month, afforded the makers of the Motiograph a splendid opportunity to present their 1911 model to the many visitors from all parts of the country, who attended the convention.

While it was not possible for Mr. A. C. Roebuck, President of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company to be present, the company was represented by the vice-president and manager, L. A. Woodward, and also by their Eastern demonstrator, Fred A. Clark, and all visitors to the Motiograph exhibit were carefully shown the excellent construction, the simplicity in assembling, and the ease of operation of the Motiograph, which is fast being recognized as the leading motion picture machine.

Quite a number of exchange men are in the city this week, among whom we saw Mr. C. D. Struble, of the United Motion Picture Company, of Oklahoma City.

In response to our query for information Mr. Struble said: "I am honored by such a request from the Moving Picture News, which is the most important and best read paper in the West.

"Ours is one of the youngest companies in the West, but is forging ahead with rapid strides. We are incorporated and have a fully paid-up capital of $40,000. We exclusively handle the Sales Company products and are fighting hard for the supremacy of the Independent cause. The exhibitors and their patrons are fully with us. We are wholesale and retail dealers in all kinds of moving picture machines, apparatus, etc. We are also the South Western agents for carbons."

In reply to our question concerning business, Mr. Struble said it was remarkably good, considering the season of the year, but there is every prospect of a bumper business when we settle down in the fall.

The Hardesty Manufacturing Co.

In the matter of properly equipping a theater for the comfort and safeguard of the patrons the seating is an important factor and must not be lost sight of as the very fact of a feeling of insecurity as to the disastrous effect in case of fire if a system of seating is installed that will not permit of easy access to the aisles or exits. Also an otherwise enjoyable entertainment is marred if one is obliged to sit in a chair that is not comfortable. The Hardesty Co., of Canal Dover, Ohio, is manufacturing a pedestal automatic folding all-aisle chair which they claim to be a safeguard against theater panics, and in view of this statement such an equipment as this should appeal to all managers and command their attention and investigation.

CLEVELAND CONVENTION OF THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE

Following our remarks on the Cleveland convention in our last week's issue it is not possible at the present time to fully report all that took place at the meeting, owing to the fact that the deliberations were all held within closed doors, but, after the meeting adjourned from business, the delegates and friends were taken on a trip by boat on Lake Erie which lasted some two hours and was wonderfully replete with exciting episodes. Among one we may mention the fact, that for the first time in the history of the lake boats a moving picture exhibition was given to the assembly of excursionists, and every make of Independent film was exhibited in the two and one-half hours occupied by this trip. How this scoop was obtained is a puzzle, but the credit must go to Messrs. Rubenstein, of the Sales Company, and Burnstein, of the Yankee, who worked indefatigably to secure the permit for the exhibition of these pictures.

On the return of the party, we were taken to the meeting rooms at Webber's Hall and some three to four hundred guests sat down to a repast provided by the Exhibitors' League. Before partaking of the good things, Mr. Neff, the president, read a telegram of regret at his absence from Mr. William N. Selig, of Chicago, and another from Mr. Gluchman, of Detroit. Then followed an address from Mr.

A GROUP OF THE COMMITTEEMEN

Havens, of the Labor League of Cleveland. Mr. Neff then welcomed the assembly in a very neat speech, among other things remarking on the respectability of the exhibitors present, and congratulated them as business men, and upon the amount of work they had accomplished during the season. He expressed great surprise that they had not organized before, and from what he could see, from that meeting, he was assured that they would be heard from in the near future with no uncertain voice. Max Levy, of Detroit, Michigan, entertained the assembly with humorous stories, and was followed by Mr. Mandelbaum, of the Lake Shore Film Exchange, who in a few words welcomed the convention to Cleveland. Mr. N. Willis, who has charge of the General Film Company's office of Cleveland, was next called upon, and was followed by Mr. Herbert Miles, secretary of the Sales Company, who touched upon his reminiscences of the early days of making pictures, and his experiences in Alaska and Cuba; he very humorously explained how they formed the first exchange organization out of the two exchanges existing fifteen years ago. Mr. Mihls, representing George Kline, of Chicago, then followed, expressing his compliments and apologizing for his absence. Mr. J. M. Kennedy, of the American Film Company, next held the floor, and was followed by Mr. Williams, of Ohio, who spoke of the educational advantages of moving pictures, and expressed the sentiment that moving pictures are the real entertainers of the public at present. The press was then called upon and was represented by Mr. Chalmers of M. P. World, Mr. Mock of Motiography and Mr. Alfred H. Saunders of the Moving Picture News. Pathes Freres was represented by Mr. Flynn, and Selig by Mr. Day, then Mr. Rubenstein followed in a humorous vein, relating his experiences in various walks of motion picturedom. After a few remarks from toastmaster, C. M. Christenson, the meeting broke up, full of congratulations on the success and the good feeling engendered by meeting the league.

OUT OF TOWN VISITORS

In addition to Mr. Struble, whom we will mention on another page, we had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Fichtenberg of New Orleans. He looks just as rosy as ever, and asking how New Orleans has been getting alone, he said there was always fight and trouble, but still he was making headway. He esti mated that the independent exchanges in New Orleans had at least two-thirds of the business from that district.

Another old friend was Mr. E. T. Peters, of Dallas, Texas, and the remark was made that he was too good-looking a man to be in the film business. We took a little exception to this because we know of some quite Mr. Peters' equal as far as looks go. On asking him how the business was, he said: "On account of the dry summer season matters have been somewhat on the standstill, but on the whole, it was going very fairly and they are managing to make money. As regards the Trust and Independent houses, he thought it was an even break.

Another Independent character was Mr. Arthur Lucas, of Washington, D. C. It is well known that everything looks good to Arthur. We have known him some years and have never known him to grumble. He is an optimist of the first water. He said, "The Independents are putting the Trust on the run." One reason for this is that the exhibitors fully resent the treatment put out to them by the Trust.

WILL MOVING PICTURES ALWAYS BE POPULAR?

By A. L. Barrett

If a constantly increasing number of moving picture establishments is any criterion, the popularity of this form of amusement is not yet on the wane. They can be seen in the business, residential or manufacturing centers of the large cities as well as in the villages, many of them provided with every comfort and convenience for their patrons. They are such a popular institution now, in fact, that when vacationists are contemplating their trips, a question frequently heard is, "Have they a moving picture house in the village?"

Business men are not in the habit of starting in business unless they know there is a demand for what they have to offer, and judging from the large crowds nearly always to be found in any of the moving picture theaters, their popularity is increasing rather than diminishing. Despite this evident popularity, however, there is a report current that they are losing their hold on the public favor, for, says this report, the public will eventually tire of speechless plays; they are all very much alike, and that, though they will even be popular with the educated or intelligent public until the novelty has worn off, still, the plots are too simple and they will ultimately tire—are tiring now, in fact—of a continual diet of cowboy, Indian, Wild West and girl-and-boy love stories.

This report is evidently circulated by the enemies of the industry, but criticism from our enemies is often the best thing for us. In this case, they have not only prophesied the ultimate doom of the entire industry, but have carefully worked out the reasons for it, and then very kindly given the results of their investigations to the manufacturers in order that they may work out their own salvation. The best friend could not have done such service!

There is some truth, however, in the report, for there certainly is a large percentage of Wild West, Indian and cowboy stories shown, and it behooves the manufacturers to refute the charges of incapacity to do better by showing that their art is capable of the most infinite variety and number of plays of the best quality, and suiting all tastes . There was a time when the picture plays were considered demoralizing to the community, and especially for children. Immediately the best friends of the industry decided to remove this objection by substituting plays at which none could cavil, and in a general way, moving pictures are now approved by everyone.

This latest criticism can be refuted in the same manner. The film manufacturers offer some pictured stories of a very high standard, all of which are thoroughly enjoyed by the audiences, but there are not sufficient of them. We will take, for instance, the manufacturer's Synopsis of Films in the July 29th issue of Moving Picture News, in which thirteen relases are shown, one that can be called particularly instructive is that of Admiral Dewey entering Manila Harbor. There are very, very few in any audience who will not thoroughly appreciate and enjoy this film, and it will also be most instructive both to the older and the younger generations. In presenting it, manufacturers and managers know that it is a profitable film, all stories from history are; in the United States, American History naturally being the most popular, but as the audiences are always more or less unified, pictures illustrating the history of any country would always prove enjoyable to a certain percentage of the audience and interesting, or instructive, as the case may be, to the remainder, and yet in spite of this hearty appreciation of the best, but a limited quantity can be obtained.

People have come to look on the moving picture plays as a medium by which they can see all the current events in any part of the world represented or, if they fancy it, an aerial meet, so it is a common thing now for a ticket seller to be asked such questions as, "Did you get the Coronation pictures yet?" "Have you any pictures about France tonight?" "When are you going to have the pictures about the Navy?" and such questions, and the persons who ask them are not those to whom a surfeit of girl-and-boy love stories or Wild West life appeal.

The public has been trained to expect the best from the moving pictures and the best they have had, but not enough of it, and there is now a very large class of people who desire something better than stories of the Wild West and the exploits of the typical cowboy with knife in belt, lariat and revolver flourishing at every opportunity. This may suit the younger or less intelligent people, and, in moderation, the older or better informed, but they are not the type which will ensure the future popularity of the industry, nor do they show the higher possibilities of the moving pictures, thereby depriving them of some of their advertising value. Whenever dramatizations of literature or history are presented on the screen, or different industries shown, they certainly meet with sufficient approval to warrant the making of more, and yet we have a continual stream of picture plays that cannot ever appeal to the intelligence of the educated person. They are, of course, popular to a certain extent, but offered in unlimited quantities, they will finally bore even their greatest admirers, except perhaps, the small boy, and they certainly do him no good. While the industry was still in its infancy these plays were popular, for no one realized that anything more than a simple tale could be represented, but now the possibilities are known, the public continually demonstrates that it wants the best types of picture plays presented, by asking the ticket seller for them, by the class of persons visiting the theaters, and by an increased audience when a higher class of entertainment is to be offered. The public is aware now that the moving pictures have attained a high standard of excellence, and in this, as in all other industries, unless this high standard is maintained in a sufficient quantity to satisfy an intelligent public, there is every reason to believe that the evil prophecy will be fulfilled and the moving pictures eventually occupy but an inferior position.

There is a countless variety of subjects that can be represented without resorting to picturing, in such profusion, a life that is rapidly dying out. What better or more interesting scenes could be filmed than those in the various large American cities? To people familiar with and those who have never visited them, they would prove intensely interesting, and a little previous acquaintance with a city would be of incalculable value to anyone. Besides, while such a continual stream of stories of Western life is shown there will be a handle against the picture plays. How often do we hear that some small boys have run away from home intending to go to the Wild West, others to play Indians, in some convenient woods, causing parents and police considerable trouble before they are found, or that while playing Indians in the back yard with an old gun, one child kills another because the gun goes off unexpectedly and the newspapers in their reports, naively add "they had been in the habit of visiting a moving picture house in the neighborhood," giving this place of amusement the entire blame for the incident, and probably ruining or damaging the manager.

If we were to pick up a newspaper of the pre-moving picture era, we should find that just as many boys wanted to play Indians and Wild West life then as now, but a scapegoat is necessary and the handiest is the moving picture house, for who would think of accusing parents of inability to control their own children? If, however, the number of such plays was limited and a higher type of life illustrated, and more travelogues or educational films introduced into the performances, there would not be a lessening of the audiences, but more probably an increase.

In view of the increasing number of moving picture houses and the audiences supporting them, there does not seem, at present, much possibility of truth in the report industriously circulated, but it has gained credence in some quarters and been quoted in at least two of the leading magazines and such reports can seriously affect the whole industry. One thing certain is that in this, as in all other manufacturers, the better the article offered for sale, the better will be the financial returns.

HEARING ON PROPOSED FIRE RULES

The Municipal Explosives Commission of New York City held an adjourned hearing at fire headquarters on Thursday forenoon on the amendments to the city ordinances governing the manufacture, transportation, storage and sale of motion picture films. The regulations at present in force have not been materially altered since the industry was in its infancy, and it is designed by the commission to have them put in such shape as will adequately protect life and property under present conditions.

The fire commissioner is a member ex officio and chairman of the commission, but he was not present. The other members of the board are Brigadier-General George O. Eaton, U. S. A., retired, acting chairman; Sidney Harris, a lawyer, of 6 Wall street; Peter P. Acritelli, former coroner, and J. Howard Wainwright, a chemist. R. S. Lundy is secretary.

Those who took part in the hearing were Arthur B. Graham, representing all the Independent manufacturers and the Metropolitan, Great Eastern, Empire, Western and Rex film exchanges; J. E. Brulatour, distributor of films for the Eastman Company; H. L. Miles, secretary of the Sales Company; Durant Church, representing the licensed manufacturers; Secretary Magie, of the Solax Company, and David I. Kelly, inspector of combustibles.

General Eaton announced at the outset that the regulations were tentative only, and that the members of the commission desired chiefly to safeguard the public. He announced that anyone interested in any way might present a brief covering his objections, and that a week would be allowed in which to present it.

It seemed to be the consensus of opinion among those present that the industry was expanding fifty per cent a year. Mr. Brulatour said that in his judgment fifty times the amount of film was being used at the present time than a half dozen years ago. It also was generally conceded that the inception of the motion picture business might be set as seven years ago.

The commission displayed lively interest in the fire figures Mr. Graham quoted from a recent issue of the Moving Picture News. The board was particularly concerned in the statement that in New York City in 1910 out of 4,032 recorded fires but two were caused by cinematograph films, and these resulting in infinitesimal damage. General Eaton asked that Mr. Kelly be sent for, but the inspector of combustibles, on his appearance, was not prepared to dispute the statement. He said, however, the chief danger lay in fires adjacent to buildings in which films were stored.

General Eaton announced that he would read the sections seriatim, and that the objections, if any, would be thrashed out before proceeding to the following section.

Sections 1 and 2 were not objected to. In discussing Sections 3 to 8 inclusive, which it was found for purposes of discussion would have to be grouped, Mr. Graham said that the manufacturers were tied up by leases and that the proposed regulations would put them under ruinous expense and compel them to move their establishments out of the city—across to Jersey or elsewhere. He said that the exchangemen were willing to partition off rooms in which the films were repaired. Many manufacturers now, the Independents' counsel continued, lined their rooms with compressed metal, which the fire department had considered requisite. Answering a question of a member of the commission, Mr. Graham said that lining the room with metal was in his opinion sufficient, as films are always packed in a metal box.

Mr. Graham spoke of the fire in the Morton building and called attention to the fact that whereas in that case every film was destroyed, the fire and the damage were confined to the one floor.

The statement was made that the film does not explode; that it simply is quick burning.

Mr. Brulatour said that when the Eastman Company gave up the manufacture of inflammable film they sold the new product at the same price.

General Eaton inquired if the provision requiring suitable foundations (Sec. 4) were eliminated would the remainder of the section be considered reasonable. Mr. Brulatour replied that he did not think so, as many of the exchanges have signed leases for terms of years and that many of the landlords will not permit alterations. The speaker continued that the real danger to the public is at the theater, not at the exchange. The latter, he said, is bound to exercise every possible care, because its whole investment is wrapped up in its particular building. Mr. Brulatour offered to demonstrate the character of fire caused by a blazing film, and said he would, right on the floor of the room, put a film on some metal and touch a match to it.

"Very well," said General Eaton. "That is, unless Inspector Kelly objects."

"I do object, emphatically!" said Mr. Kelly.

Mr. Brulatour said the third section would seriously injure him, as he kept continually on hand unexposed film to the amount of between one and two hundred thousand feet. He showed the metal receptacles in which they were inclosed. He said the quantity of film he quoted was necessary for filling emergency orders. The great majority of the goods handled by him, he said, was never in his place over night, coming in the forenoon and being reshipped unopened in the afternoon. He estimated that the Eastman Company had in storage at its home plant an average of ten million feet of unexposed film.

At this point Mr. Kelly, speaking of those places which the attorneys described as junk shops, said that recently he had discovered a man with 300 reels in his possession; the building was unfireproofed; he was engaged in putting the reels through a bath designed to remove the celluloid; this latter material was piled from the floor to the ceiling. Above this floor two thousand men and women were employed. The inspector arrested the offender.

Mr. Graham, in answering a question of the commission, said that from three to eight persons were engaged in the exchanges in examining films.

It was agreed that in fairness it would be necessary to exempt manufacturers from the operation of Section 10.

Mr. Graham said it appeared to him that Section 15 seemed unduly oppressive and asked the commission if it did not think the fee of $50 could be made easier. General Eaton, in replying, said that the money did not go into the city treasury, but to the firemen's pension fund. It developed that five independent and six licensed exchanges would be affected by the section. The General, in continuing, said that the commission did not desire to hamper any business—simply desired to safeguard the community. "It does seem to us," he said, "that this $50 fee is reasonable. Exchangemen will be the only people to be affected."

Mr. Magie, speaking of the Solax plant, described the efforts made by his company to make every part of the plant absolutely safe from fire and told of the recent commendation of the fire department authorities following an inspection. He pointed out that it would be a hardship if, after a manufacturer had taken every precaution to comply with legal requirements, he should be compelled to make extensive, expensive alterations. A member of the board replied that the new regulations were intended to apply to plants hereafter to be established.

Inspector Kelly inquired as to what the commission intended to do in regard to safeguarding the public while films were being transported within the city. He told of a recent case within his own observation where a boy in a surface car had a film out of its metal box, and, while he calmly smoked a cigarette, unrolled the film and critically examined it. The boy was arrested. General Eaton said the board had not thought it essential to cover this point, but that after listening to Mr. Kelly he was convinced it would be necessary. Mr. Miles said that the express companies, for their own protection, had stringent rules for handling films in transportation, and he thought if the commission should provide against such cases as Mr. Kelly quoted the public interests would be fully protected.

Section 14, which had been interpreted by many as meaning that exhibitors would have to pay a fee of $50 for the approval of their machine, was changed by the board inserting the words "of a type," it being explained that the omission was an oversight.

When the commission has decided on the form the amendments will take they will be submitted to the aldermen for action. As presented to the hearing the tentative regulations stand as follows:

DEFINITION.—By the term INFLAMMABLE MOTION PICTURE FILMS is meant, a film made of a nitrocellulose produet or other similar substanee, used for the purpose of displaying motion pictures for exhibition.

Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to store or keep on hand any inflammable motion picture films in a quantity greater than ten reels or aggregating more than ten thousand feet in length without a permit from the Fire Commissioner.

Sec. 2. Applications for permits for storage of inflammable motion picture films shall give in detail the following information:

(a) Name and address of the applicant;
(b) Location of premises;
(c) Other purpose for which the building is used;
(d) Nature of the business in which the applicant is engaged in such building.

Sec. 3. No permit for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall be issued for any building:

(a) Which is situated within fifty feet of the nearest wall of any building occupied as a school, theater or other place of public amusement or assembly;
(b) Which is occupied wholly or in part as a tenement house, dwelling or hotel;
(c) Which is artificially lighted by any means other than electricity;
(d) Which is a frame or wooden building;
(e) Which is not equipped with an approved system of automatic sprinklers.

Sec. 4. No permit for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall be issued for any building which does not contain one or more separate compartments for the storage of such films. Each compartment shall not exceed one thousand cubic feet in space area, and shall be constructed upon suitable foundations, having no opening except the door leading into the building, and having the walls, floor and roof constructed of Portland cement concrete at least six inches thick, or brick masonry at least eight inches thick. The bricks to be laid in and covered by Portland cement mortar.

Sec. 5. A compartment for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall not be artificially lighted except by electric lights having air-tight bulbs, globes or tubes encased in suitable wire cages fitted with keyless sockets. All plugs, switches, etc., shall be on the outside of the compartment and at least four feet above the floor.

Sec. 6. The door for each storage compartment shall be of metal or other fireproof material, and self-closing; and all shelves and fixtures inside the compartment on which inflammable motion picture films are to be stored shall be of metal or other non-combustible material.

Sec. 7. Each compartment wherein inflammable motion picture films are stored shall be ventilated by a flue constructed of concrete and lined with tile pipe at least eight inches square inside measurement and extending from the floor of the compartment at a point opposite the door to at least six feet above the highest point of the roof of any building within a radius of twenty-five feet.

Sec. 8. Each ventilating flue shall have an opening into the compartment 4 by 6 inches in area, placed 3 inches below the ceiling, and covered at both ends with 16-mesh brass wire gauze firmly fixed in place.

Sec. 9. All examining, repairing or piecing together of inflammable motion picture films shall be done in a room not used for any other purpose and separated from the rest of the building by fireproof partitions and self-closing fireproof doors.

Sec. 10. Not more than ten reels nor more than ten thousand feet in the aggregate of inflammable motion picture films shall be under examination, repair or handling at any one time, and each reel of films shall be enclosed in a tight metal box when not being handled.

Sec. 11. Each room used for the repairing or piecing together of inflammable motion picture films shall contain a metal can, wherein all waste parts and scraps shall be placed and kept covered with water.

Sec. 12. No collodion, amyl acetate or other similar inflammable cement or liquid in quantities greater than one quart shall be kept in a room or compartment wherein inflammable motion picture films are stored or repaired.

Sec. 13. No heat other than steam or hot water, and no stove, forge, torch, boiler, furnace, flame or fire; electric dynamo, motor hoist or other electric appliance that may produce an exposed spark, shall be allowed in any room or compartment used for the storage or repair of inflammable motion picture films.

Sec. 14. It shall be unlawful for any person to use for exhibition purposes within the City of New York any inflammable motion picture films unless in a machine or apparatus of a type for which a certificate of approval has been issued by the Fire Commissioner.

Sec. 15. (Sec. 48, Chapter III—Bonds and Fees). For a permit allowing the storage of inflammable motion picture films, as provided for in section 1 of this chapter, the applicant shall pay an annual fee of Fifty Dollars.

Sec. 16. (Sec. 49, Chapter III—Bonds and Fees). For a certificate of approval of a machine or apparatus for the display of motion pictures, the applicant shall pay a fee of Fifty Dollars.

Sec. 17. A person who violates any of the provisions of this chapter is guilty of a misdemeanor.

THE LUCK OF A TRAMP

How fate intervened to make a man of a tramp is a well told story recently produced by the Imp Company entitled, "The Toss of a Coin." It is a splendid drama, carefully staged and excellently acted—a story that will appeal to the better emotions of everyone. The theme is ingeniously worked out, with fidelity to facts and situations, and the interest is tense from title to trade-mark. A young tramp is herded in an illy-kept jail with two older, hardened criminals. The party is released and the younger man slouches out, disheartened and desperate. The jailor gives him a coin which is the sum total of his finances. He wanders to a bridge across a stream and, leaning against the railing, he gives way to reverie. The hand of every man is against him and he has nothing left to live for. Thoughts of death come to him and he reaches his hand in his pocket and produces the solitary coin. Heads he lives; tails he throws himself into the water. He tosses up the coin and then excitedly picks it up. Fate has decided. He will end his life. He clambers up on the railing, poises and is about to leap when his action is arrested by an honest old farmer, who is driving to town to engage the services of a farm hand. The young man is taken to the farm, given suitable wearing apparel and engages in honest work. How he wins the handsome daughter of the old man and saves his well-filled wallet from the two thieves, who were his former cell mates, completes a story that is intensely interesting.

MY IMPRESSIONS OF KINEMACOLOR AS SEEN AT THE HERALD SQUARE THEATER.

By Our "Roving Commissioner."

Two weeks ago Kinemacolor made its first bow to an American audience at the Herald Square Theater. Its success has been, in a measure, phenomenal. I use the expression "in a measure" because the phenomena exists not in the fact that Kinemacolor is a success as regards its commercial and entertaining qualities, but in the thing itself. As we sit and watch the result of the unfolding of reel after reel of insignificant looking, grayish colored film, we are not surprised at the loud applause with which each Kinemacolor is greeted—an applause which, at the Herald Square Theater, and in fact, wherever they have been shown, has only ceased while people ate and slept.

Having seen the Kinemacolors at the company's office, I had a chance to meditate upon and digest somewhat the wonders of this phenomenon of phenomenons, but not until I had seen them in the theater, with distance lending enchantment to the already perfect and beautiful reproductions of nature, did I realize to the full the wonderful qualities of this discovery. It seemed as though the heavens had opened and a great light had appeared. I found myself wondering what riddle science would next unfold for us.

To give an accurate description of the Kinemacolors is a difficult matter. Go and see them—you will get the greatest surprise you ever got in your life. Nevertheless I will tell you a few things about Kinemacolors—not individually but collectively. I am not going to tell you in what order the royal family moved, or in what order regiment followed regiment in the coronation procession—that you will know yourself when you go to the theater—it has nothing to do with the phenomenon. You have seen the soft gray and white clouds flitting over a sky of summer blue, that was full of sunshine; and the just born leaves of the trees folded back by a gentle breeze, showing a profusion of light and shadow in gray greens, and green greens; you have stood at the opposite side of the square and gazed across a space of closely clipped lawn at the sombre gray or brown stone houses beyond; you have looked off into the distance at rolling hills, or towering mountains banked up against the sky, or a horizon which melted hazily into the tints of the setting sun. All this you will see again in Kinemacolor. You will see it just as you saw it in the real world. In the world of Kinemacolor the flowers bloom just as they do here—their colors are changed not one iota. Their petals are just as waxen and beautiful, and their foliage just as glossy and green—their variegated leaves are just as brilliant as you see them in your own garden. The perspective of the Kinemacolor is faultless, and the stereoscopic effects so perfect that even the texture of different fabrics is clearly discernible—velvet, silk, satin or calico are discernible one from the other. Even the different metals can be distinguished, the brass musical instruments used in the coronation procession are just as distinctly brass in the Kinemacolor as though you were looking at the real thing. Says Mr. Harry M. Hyams, manager of the Herald Square Theater, "I have never seen audiences so enthusiastic over anything as over Kinemacolor. Why," said he, "you ought to hear them here some nights—you'd think they would tear the house down with their applause—and the house packed."

"Then you think it will be a financial success?" I quizzed.

"I can't see any reason why it shouldn't be—it certainly is a wonderful thing," was his answer.

Kinemacolors are being shown now at the Garrick Theater in Chicago, at the Garrick in St. Louis, the Schubert in Kansas City and Tremont Temple in Boston. On the 21st of August they will open also in Seattle, Wash., Dallas, Texas, the Hippodrome in Cleveland, and other American cities.

The Investiture of the young prince with the insignia of the Prince of Wales is considered by the Kinemacolor Company to be the most perfect Kinemacolor yet taken. The Kinemacolor people possess the only picture of the absolute ceremony of the coronation.

There is dignity surrounding the Kinemacolors which do not attach to the ordinary moving picture. In fact, it was the wish of one prominent member of the company not to use the word "picture" in connection with the productions, but to use instead the name "Kinemacolors," which seems to me very appropriate.

The stage setting given them at the Herald Square is very artistic; on either side of the screen are banked palms and other foliage plants intermingled with red and white blossoms. The music also adds dignity to the scene; the choir singing back of the scenes as the surpliced choir boys troop into the chapel for the coronation services, is very effective. Never before did the press of New York, collectively speaking, give as much space, unsolicited, to any theatrical attraction as it has given to Kinemacolor; it has taken the city by storm. Judging from the expression of the faces of the people which I saw in the theater, an astonishment has taken possession of them, which has not yet explained itself. The program as I saw it was as follows:

Normal London, showing world's largest city in everyday attire before the coronation.

Unveiling Queen Victoria's Memorial, in front of Buckingham Palace. Ceremony shows King, German Emperor, the Queen, Empress of Germany and all the ladies and gentlemen of the royal court.

Review of the troops (over five thousand troops in full dress trappings), return to palace, return of royal family to Buckingham Palace, Canadian troops at Liverpool, disembarking from transport and commencing march to encampment.

Garter Investiture of the Prince of Wales, showing procession from Windsor Castle to St. George's Chapel and return.

The dethroned King of Portugal (King Manuel) is in this procession.

Canadian troops in London.

(b) Fashions—Coronation gowns worn by professional models at Kensington. (c) Peers and peeresses. (d) Illuminations.

THANHOUSER'S "ROMEO AND JULIET"

The "Romeo and Juliet," of the Thanhouser Co., which was exhibited at the office of the Distributing and Sales Co. of America during the past week, is a most beautiful and fascinating film, the preparation of which reflects much credit, not only on the Thanhouser Co. in their choice of a classic theme, but upon the director and his company engaged in its actual preparation.

The stage settings are artistic and beautiful; the costumes are well chosen to suit the particular period in which the drama is supposed to take place, and most striking in effect.

Miss Julia Taylor, who plays the role of Juliet, is most charming in the part; Mrs. Walters, in the part of the nurse, makes up as a dear, indulgent old lady; and Mr. Lessee, who plays the part of Romeo, holds his own in a most dignified and dramatic fashion—his work is good. The scenes best in effect are perhaps the duel scenes, and the tomb scenes. The love element is well brought out, and, in fact, there is little left to be desired in the whole production, and the Thanhouser Co. is to be congratulated on its success. The Thanhouser Co. have also through the production of this film gained the distinction of bringing out the first two reel domestic picture in America. They are contemplating the production of another of Shakespeare's dramas, "The Tempest," which will no doubt equal if not excel in dramatic and artistic effect the film whose praises we have just been singing.

MOVING PICTURE ACTORS' AGENCY.

We understand Gregory, Phillips & Stegner have planned for a long time to open a department devoted exclusively to the motion picture people, to look after the engaging of people, and placing of sketches, and to that end, have just made arrangements with Milton E. Hoffman, to devote his time exclusively, catering to their demands. Mr. Hoffman has been treasurer of Wm. Morris, Inc., and manager of Wm. Faversham and other well-known stars.

Dallas, Ore.—The Grand Theater has been sold by O. T. Larsen, of Portland, to Henry Stump, owner of the Star Theater here.

Duront, Okla.—Joe S. Jennings has purchased the People's Theater from A. J. Allison.

Chenoa, Ill.—Renn Chapman has purchased the Starkey & Payne Pastime Theater.

Washington, Pa.—The Arcadian Theater was damaged by fire to the amount of $300.

Bedford, Ia.—Mr. Welch, of Clarinda, will erect a new opera house here to be known as Clark's Opera House.

Martinsville, Ill.—Carl Ballard has sold the Nickelodeon Theater to Alva Hix, who will take charge.

FROM THE OBSERVATORY.

By G. F. Blaisdell.

The Board of Aldermen of Buffalo, after many hearings and much discussion and more or less acrimony, has refused, by a vote of 19 to 4 to close moving picture shows on Sunday. The adherents of the closing programme say the end is not yet, but the vote speaks for itself. Your average alderman has his ear pretty close to the ground when there is proceeding a discussion in which many people are interested, and he votes on the popular side. Valuable franchises, of course, are not now or here under consideration. Alderman Sullivan, who introduced the measure in the board, when he realized that the vote was against him, said:

"This fight has been made for a high moral object. It has been lost. These men will keep up this agitation. I am ready to reintroduce this resolution when they are ready. Aside from this, some good has been accomplished. These picture men are seeking the approbation of the public. This discussion will put them on their mettle and they will try to improve their shows and eliminate the objectionable features pointed out to them."

That puts the situation in the hands of the exhibitors. Care in the selection of their Sunday programmes will avoid adverse criticism and consequently the possibility of adverse legislation.

The Federation of Holy Name Societies, of Hudson County, N. J., has adopted a resolution asking the Jersey City Board of Aldermen to pass an ordinance providing for the appointment of moving picture censors. The Legislature will be asked to create a State board of censors, with power to pass on all films before they are exhibited publicly.

The Pittsburg Dispatch states that every day 15,000,000 persons attend picture shows throughout the country. At least four times too many. Why not be reasonable? The truth suffices to make a sensational statement.

New York's Governor has vetoed a bill exempting applicants for licenses to operate moving picture machines from serving an apprenticeship of at least six months, under a licensed operator. Governor Dix said he was not satisfied that the change was wise. This will be good news for those who have licenses; it will be bad news for those seeking them.

You can't beat the citizens of Colorado for enterprise. The Greater Colorado Committee has caused to be made 3,000 feet of film showing the beauties of its state, which will be released about the third week of this month, and it is planned that these pictures shall be shown all over the country. They will be worth seeing. The committee is inaugurating a post card campaign, by means of which all Coloradoans will notify friends everywhere to be sure and see the pictures.

As an aftermath of the manufacture of the pictures, graft charges have been made in connection with the award of the contract to the W. H. Swanson Film Company.

"This talk of graft in the letting of the film contract is bosh; we have perfect confidence in the Greater Colorado committee and believe that their best possible choice was made under the circumstances," declared President C. A. Johnson, of the Chamber of Commerce.

"I believe it is true that H. H. Buckwalter of the General Film Company did offer to take the picture of the industrial parade without charge, but that was not all we wanted," he continued. "We wanted a film that would be representative of Colorado, and we paid $4,500 to get that film and to get assurance that the film would be shown in 6,200 moving picture houses throughout the country. If we had it to do over again, we would sign the same contract.

"The whole trouble is the outgrowth of rivalry between the two moving picture concerns. The one that was not fortunate enough to get the contract is circulating these stories, which are absurd.

"We are perfectly satisfied with the films; we need the $500 the supervisors have voted to give us, and we shall be at the meeting of the aldermen Tuesday night to nail any false statements and to explain our position, if called upon to do so."

As an illustration of the civic enterprise displayed in connection with the making of these pictures, the acting Mayor of Denver issued an invitation to all citizens of the city to appear on the streets on the evening of July 29 in order that the photographs to be taken of the City of Lights should be enhanced in interest. Buildings were brilliantly illuminated. Photographs were taken from the four points of the compass from the highest tower in the center of the city.

How strange it seems to see Miss Turner and Miss Storey in the same picture! It is the blending of the East with the West; the fraternizing of the slight New Yorker, whose remarkable versatility, whether in comedy, drama or tragedy, has won all hearts, with the splendid, robust Westerner, whose skillful horsemanship and unaffected womanliness have been the admiration of all beholders.

St. Paul may be the pioneer in the use of the moving picture in the public schools. W. E. Boeringer, a member of the Board of Education, will at the next meeting of his associates ask for an investigation of the feasibility of the scheme. Of the four members of the board two openly favor it. The third, while in sympathy with the project, is inclined to the belief that it should wait on matters he thinks more important. The fourth, a woman, is in doubt. The result of the discussion may be influenced by the expense involved. The St. Paul Dispatch, commenting editorially on the subject, is inclined to think the schools have a tendency to do too many things and do none well. It concludes:

"It is doubtful if moving pictures should be incorporated in the school courses. Probably their place in the schools would be as the adjuncts to neighborhood or social center meetings which may be held in the school buildings."

The report that some of the open-air picture exhibitors in New York State will take advantage of the new boxing law by putting on bouts in connection with pictures will be read with dismay by those who have at heart the best interests of the moving picture. The industry has to combat enough imaginary evils now without encountering a real peril. The permission to put on boxing bouts between pictures will bring the whole business into disrepute. There should be legislation to prohibit it. Let us have these two forms of entertainment separate. The popularizing of pugilism should not be permitted at the expense of the pictures. Let it stand alone.

It cost Vincenzo Maglicia $5 to climb a semaphore pole the better to see a picture show. The poor man did not know that the Eric Railroad had complained to the police that signal lamps and other property was being missed. Maglicia told the Newark (N. J.) judge before whom he was arraigned that his wife had said they could see the show from where they were and save the price of admission. The brute! Same old Adam.

Moving picture acting is not all cakes and ale. Miss Elizabeth Simmons, in the act of eloping from an old Staten Island mansion by means of an improvised painters' scaffolding and a ladder, was dropped fifteen feet by reason of a collapsing scaffold. Moral: When erecting a painters' scaffold, employ a painter to do the job.

Miss May Gorem, climbing a tree in New Rochelle, saw hanging from a limb something that looked to her urban eyes like a pocketbook. So she took hold of it. She was stung, all right—several times. When she finally reached the ground she somewhat informally resigned her position. She was, in fact, as mad as all the hornets. As the camera man was not overlooking any real good bets, he has a complete record of the disaster. The picture should be interesting, especially so to Miss Gorem.

Mr. Exhibitor, a word with you: As the writer of this more or less uninteresting comment was seated at his home desk going over exchanges there came to him through the adjacent trees of Flatbush the voice of a splendid phonograph. As he listened he heard the "Duet with the Flute." He lighted up the oldest pipe and "stopped the press," while he adjourned to an easy chair by the open window and looked up at the August moon. As the last notes of the human flute died away there came the sextet from "Lucia." The thought then occurred to the writer, as it has many times before and for a number of years: Why does not some exhibitor try the experiment of installing a first-class phonograph, one of the best, in fact, and instead of the usually inane illustrated song, which, as a rule, is carried more by the pictures than by the singing, give his audience the treat of some really good music? The best restaurants in New York, those employing first-class orchestras, have used and continue to use the phonograph as an adjunct of their entertainment, sometimes independent of and sometimes in conjunction with their orchestras. If this form of entertainment is enjoyed by those who have in their homes pianos and phonographs and other musical instruments, why should it not be doubly enjoyed by those to whom the best music is denied? Now don't say the sextet from "Lucia," for instance, would go over the heads of your audience. It would not. People are most attracted by that with which they are least acquainted—and this is especially true of music.

The temporary use of the records would cost no more than the wages of a singer—and two records a day would be sufficient. It is possible that some exhibitor has tried the experiment. If there be such the writer would be glad to hear the result.

THE CHICAGO LETTER

Of all the legitimate theaters Chicago boasts of there are only three houses open in town at the present time and these doing a poor business, while over 400 picture houses are doing a good business. Two of the Loop Theaters have been converted into picture shows and seem to be the only ones thriving.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Chicago is growing larger, at each meeting new members are being enrolled and its success seems certain.

"The Settler's Wife," by the Nestor Company, was a very good moral story of a faithless wife and for the life of me I can't understand why the Chicago Censorship Board refused a permit on it.

The Adelphi Theater, at Van Buren street and Western avenue, has been purchased by Berger Brothers. A twilight curtain has been installed and extensive repairs made. Independent pictures will furnish the program.

The Kinemacolor pictures of King George's coronation, which followed Lipman Howe's picture show at the Garrick Theater, are packing the house twice daily at 25, 35 and 50 cents. Kind of a strong argument for pictures as a high class attraction.

Sittner, the pioneer of the north side "Vodevil" is running pictures in his theater this summer and passing the house the other day a 3-foot banner across the front caught my eye; it read something like this: "Coolest Place in Town, 24 Open Windows, 16 Electric Fans and 2 First Run Pictures."

I wonder if the pictures are also used to cool off the place.

Mutt and Jeff are in for some newspaper notoriety. That Horsley knows nothing about the following article appeared in one of the local papers Saturday:

Morgan Park manager declares them fit for "highbrows;" partner objects. Morgan Park's Frances Theater was dark last night, and it was all because of the ethics of the moving picture drama.

Is "Mutt and Jeff" better than "The Holy City," or are scenes on the rolling waves of the Atlantic or in the jungles of India the proper thing from a manager's standpoint? That's what caused the trouble, according to Jack Kingston of Kingston & Thomas, "featuring the greatest ragtime piano player in the world," and part owner of the theater at Morgan Park, in his tale of woe last night.

The other owner is W. D. Hurlbut, traffic manager of the Wisconsin Pulp & Paper Company, and Jack Kingston says that there is no affinity between pulp and moving pictures.

Incidentally, according to the pulp man, who is said to be interested in the show, Morgan Park is too high class a ward of the city—it's the newest one—to relish such an exhibition as "Mutt and Jeff."

Kingston was disturbed last night when he told his story.

"This pulp partner of mine don't know the game," he shouted. "I do. I've been known all over the country in a good vaudeville specialty.

"This fellow Hurlbut comes along and says he will be my partner at Morgan Park. We had an agreement on what we would do, and I put all my money into it. Mind, I'm the professional and ought to know.

"My daughter Margaret was to handle the door and take the receipts. My wife and I took charge of the show last Tuesday. I had bought a home at Morgan Park a year ago.

"What did I find? Bad pictures. I wanted to put on 'Mutt and Jeff,' and he says: 'No, this town is too high-brow.' I objected. Then he went to Judge Brentano and the Judge appointed a receiver in the person of his own bailiff."

"What did you do?" the irate vaudevillian was asked.

"I said 'Mutt and Jeff,' or nothing, and the house is dark."

From other sources it seems evident that some one must untangle the troubles of the Frances Theater at Morgan Park. Kingston admitted that there was a small amount of money owing.

"The Pied Piper of Hamelin," from the German Fable, was shown at a local theater where the manager announced that the Pied Piper was the St. Patrick of the Germans.

The Prodigal Son, taken from the Bible and filmed accordingly, was a recent special release by the Eclair Company and proved to be a very good depiction of that part of the scripture. J. J. SULLIVAN.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., August 9—Moving picture managers have been requesting their exchanges to provide them with all the pictures in which children are taking an active part, for the past week, with the "Baby Films," has been a most successful one.

The fact that children are playing a very important part in the moving picture industry is a good point to note, for there is no denying the truth that the camera has opened up a wonderful field of education and livelihood for the little ones. Who is there who does not enjoy looking at a pretty baby? Who is there who does not love a clever youngster? And who, of all the great army of moving picture patrons, is there who does not like to see depicted on the picture sheet a child of tender years, clever as can be, pretty as a little elf and doing things that would be a credit to people of mature years.

The little ones are always interesting, God bless 'em, whether in the picture or on the street, and the films that get the crowds in this city are the ones that have the clever youngsters displayed in the lithographs in the lobby.

The past week I have visited several of the houses where children were shown in moving pictures.

"Oh, look at that pretty baby," I heard a man say. "Come, let us see what that child does in the picture."

And there you are. That was twenty cents "right off the reel," to talk shop, and the manager who turns down a "kid picture," well, he ought to be in charge of a coal yard or ice wagon.

To Thanhouser is due a great deal of credit for boosting the juvenile and infant stars. "The Thanhouser Kid," I believe, set the pace, and Biograph, Vitagraph, Rex, when it got to noting, and other firms took the hint and fell in line for the promoting of the little ones before the camera. I have witnessed pictures that contained some wonderful children. This is especially true of Thanhouser, Vitagraph, Biograph and Rex reels. One wonders how the youngsters are taught to do the things we see them get by with so artistically on the picture sheet. As I stated before, it's a great lesson for every one. It's a great field for the babies who can act. It also serves as an object lesson to those other little tots who are old enough to comprehend and who look at their little comrades in the pictures.

"Just see what that little girl is doing," I heard a mother say to her offspring in one of the theaters here this week. "Now, why can't you be good and nice when Mama speaks to you as that little girl is."

There was an illustration for both mother and child, and the little one remembered it, too.

There cannot be too many "kid reels," I think—that is, if they are high class, contain the great winning element of human nature and present the babies just like we love to see them, in all their innocence and with every attribute of winsomeness; but God deliver us from the precocious brats that some time get before the camera; also the unruly and "kick-the shins" and "stamp-the-floor" brand. They are an eyesore.

Keep up the juvenile element, Mr. Manufacturer, for you will find a ready sale for such pictures.

In one of the local papers I am running daily a column known as "The Stroller's Dope," and an evening or two ago I gave Eddie Kelley, operator at the Photo Play Theater, quite a write-up. Kelley, I understand, is "some mitt artist," having won the lightweight championship of Brighton Park, Chicago, which place is known for the good boxers it has turned out. Since coming to Hot Springs Kelley has longed to smell the leather of five ounce gloves and has been itching for a "friendly bout." He asked me to try and find out if there were any lightweights in Hot Springs who would care to mix it with him, so I stated that fact in the "dope" the next morning. Are there fighters here? Why, we hadn't finished running off the last edition when the office was swarming with pugs of all weights and description. I sent them over to Kelley, where they found a few more waiting for him. Kelley was busy turning the machine at the Photo Play and he certainly had his pick of the bunch. He appears to be a very nice sort of a chap, and if it can be done without letting the "powers that be" hear of it, it is more than likely that Kelley and one of the local artists will mix it for a little side purse and points in the near future. Wrestling is permitted in this city, but the "kibosh" has been put on boxing. Therefore, it's out to the wild, wild woods for those who want to see the moving picture operator in action.

Two local managers, I heard, are contemplating opening a house in Malvern, which at present is without amusement of any kind. They do not wish the details of the venture known as yet, but indications point to the fact that there will be something doing in this line in the very near future.

From Kansas City I get a report that one of the city judges there has decided that there is no law against the moving picture shows under ordinances covering theatres, and, therefore, the Sunday closing question cannot be declared violated on those grounds. However, says the same jurist, there is ample opportunity to take a crack at the managers for laboring on the Christian Sabbath, and those who prosecuted the men declare that they will bring action on that charge if the shows continue to run on Sunday. Let me think a moment, wasn't it somewhere else where we have had that Sunday closing question. Why, to be sure it was, and right here in Hot Springs, too. Oh, let's forget it.

And here's another bit of news by the way of the Rockies. I understand that a certain church in Denver, Col., recognizing the competition in the Sunday moving picture shows, has decided to dispense with their regular service and install a moving picture machine and show religious and educational films; also, bless your heart, benevolence is to play a great part in the entertainment, for the show is to be absolutely free. How's that for "bucking the game," eh?

There were several good picture here the past week, and I, along with a host of others that packed the Photo Play Theater, thoroughly enjoyed "The Outlaw's Trail," one of the good old American's western reels. The Great Northern also sent "The King's Favorite," which, as usual, was staged in faultless style, and in "Silverwing's Dream" Bison left nothing to be desired. Rex took the honors of the week with its "Vagabond" reel, which, Rex, allow me to state, was "some picture." Biograph also sent in an excellent picture in "The Thief and the Girl," yet one could not help but see situations closely resembling those of "Raffles," and the "gentleman thief" was certainly a close student of Browning. They don't do those things out in these parts, Biograph. Edison's "Price of a Man" also was well received, and to Essanay and George Anderson I claim the blue ribbon for Trust pictures is theirs. "The Outlaw Samaritan" was a winner in every sense of the word. It was one of the best pictures that Essanay has sent here in weeks, and Anderson deserves a world of credit for that production. Lubin gave us a real laugh in "Duke de Ribbon Counter." It was a jolly comedy and there was a lesson that was not lost by the audience, either, who witnessed the picture. "In Northern Forests" was the Vitagraph's best offering for the week, and it was featured by some excellent acting by the baby in the reel. All in all, it proved to be a bang-up reel, and their other picture, "The Stumbling Block," was also excellent.

All of the theaters have installed extra electric fans. I was in the Scenic Theater, which is situated on upper Central avenue near the palatial Arlington Hotel, and which gets the patronage of the elite, and was delighted with the coolness found in the theater. Business has picked up wonderfully the past week, and the summer promises to be a most successful and busy one.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

FROM OUR LOS ANGELES CORRESPONDENT.

Fire in the Electric moving picture theater, Main street, opposite Temple street, recently caused damage to the extent of $100. The fire consumed one reel of film and was confined to the operating room. Those who were present at the time quietly left the house, no one being hurt. What caused the strip of celluloid to catch on fire is unknown. A. L. Gore, proprietor, said that the film was one of the Selig releases entitled, "It Happened in the West." The film, he declared, was supposed to be impervious to fire.

The new censorship law which was to go into effect August 17, had to be repassed by the city council a few days ago because of a slight inaccuracy in the original ordinance.

In the original draft as approved by the council, one of the organizations empowered to appoint one of the five members of the board of censors was named as the Civic League. As there is no such league, but an association by that name, the error had to be rectified.

The question now arises as to the constitutionality of the ordinance and if the council had any legal right to delegate to any organization without official existence, the right to appoint public or quasi-public officials. Should the matter ever be taken to court the ordinance in all probability would be declared as unconstitutional.

There is a feeling that a dangerous precedent is being established in allowing unofficial organizations to appoint members to public bodies. The Civic Association and the Southern California Motion Picture Men's Association is each to appoint a member to the censorship board. The board of education, the mayor and the police commission also is to each appoint a member.

If it is legal to allow the appointment of two censors to be made outside the city government by persons not authorized directly by the people to transact public business, then, the argument is advanced, the city council could authorize any individual to appoint all the members of the fire or police department.

M. Stutz, recently arrested on a charge of violating the sign ordinance, was discharged almost immediately after appearing before the judge. Incidentally the judge decided that the ordinance does not and could not regulate signs within the property line. M. Stutz, who is part owner of the Shell Theater, was charged with exhibiting signs with no wooden backs to them—a violation of the city laws. He contended through his attorney that as his signs were inside the property line the law had nothing to say in his case. The court sustained the argument.

The Plaza Theater, 423 North Main street, has been enlarged and now contains 300 seats. The house is situated in the Mexican part of the town and caters to their trade. They show four vaudeville acts and three reels of pictures for five cents. The pictures are licensed.

The Empress Theater, Sullivan & Considine circuit, is at present showing old licensed pictures. Mr. Considine recently bought about forty reels of pictures at Seattle which are being used along the Coast in all his theaters. The pictures are "fierce" and full of rain. When the pictures have all been shown, the theater will again be supplied by Miles Brothers exchange.

The Banner Theater, recently the Family, has been rebuilt and is now the finest 5-cent picture house in the city. J. C. Hening is the proprietor. A daylight curtain, which is said to be the best in the city, is one of its features. Beautiful electroliers hang from the ceiling, and the walls and ceiling are artistically, but not gaudily, decorated. On the exterior is a large United States banner outlined by numerous incandescent lights. The capacity is 350 seats. Three licensed second-run pictures and one illustrated song are shown. Despite the fact that it is a beautiful house and located in the best part of the city, it is said, by good authority, that the owner has been losing money every day since it opened.

The Art Theater, Broadway, near Fifth street, has been remodeled inside and out. Three licensed pictures are shown for five cents. Harry Hahn is the proprietor.

The United States Theater, Main street, near Market street, changed from Independent pictures to licensed. This makes the third house showing trust pictures north of First street on Main street. Recently this was reversed, only one house running trust pictures but within the past few weeks the proprietors have switched over. The Electric Theater is the only house which has never changed, having shown Associated pictures since it opened. The Theater Metropole is the only representative of the Independent side at present in that part of the city.

The National Theater, S. Lustig, proprietor, is running five reels for five cents. This is the only house in the city giving three changes a week and the only 5-cent house showing more than four reels. Independent pictures are shown. Mr. Lustig, by these means, hopes to keep the trade away from the new theater, The Banner, which is a few doors below him.

The opera house in Needles, Arizona, was closed recently because of the extreme heat. H. D. Long, proprietor, has built an airdome to take its place. It is said to be the largest open air theater in Arizona and is supplied with pictures by Miles Brothers exchange.

E. C. Miles, of Miles Brothers, was in the city a few days ago. He came here to meet his wife who has just returned from New York where she has been visiting. Mr. Miles visited the local branch of his exchange before leaving for the north.

There has been numerous rumors in this city that the Bison Company, which is at present stopping in Bear Valley, has had to vacate its position because of the forest fire which has been raging in the mountains for the past two weeks. The latest report however, and it is stated on good authority, declares that the company is still in the valley despite the surrounding fire. The conflagration, which is the largest in the history of this section of the country, has destroyed hundreds of thousands of dollars in valuable timber and mountain resorts. As a result of this huge fire, some excellent fire pictures may be expected in the near future from the Bison Company.

W. F. Wallace, formerly Los Angeles correspondent for the once Film Index, is wanted in Los Angeles for obtaining money under false pretenses. Although there is no warrant out for his arrest, he is charged with having obtained six reels from Miles Bros. Exchange for which he did not pay, defrauding the owners of an airdome out of two weeks' rent, cheating an operator and four persons, who were doing vaudeville acts for him, out of their salaries and getting subscriptions for the Film Index and keeping the money. At the present time he is believed to be in Utah, probably attempting to defraud other kind-hearted persons.

It appears to be an old trick for Mr. Wallace to "beat" the various persons he comes into contact with. He plied his thieving business in Bakersfield and Fresno and is reported to have operated in numerous other cities in California. He is of a good appearance, is an excellent talker and makes a good impression upon a person. He is described as a young man, about 5 feet 6 inches in height, weight 185 pounds, smooth shaven, fair complexion, blue eyes and usually wears a light grey suit. Exhibitors will be wise to fight shy of this man.

Wallace's trickery was first brought to the attention of operators who had each paid him $1.50 for subscriptions to the Film Index. When asked again and again why the magazine did not arrive, he made different excuses each time, and so plausible were they that he was not suspected until recently. A few weeks ago he approached Mr. Robertson, proprietor of the Electrodome of this city. Wallace talked the exhibitor into renting the place to him for two weeks. This done he put up a good story to the manager of the local branch of Miles Bros. Exchange, who was acquainted with him and therefore allowed him to have two changes of reels without first receiving pay for them. His next step was to hire vaudeville artists. Mrs. Davis, one of the vaudeville actors, appeared, despite the fact that she was ill, as she needed the money. Such a fine "gift of gab" has the man that he had Mrs. Robertson, the wife of the proprietor, acting as cashier for him. The first week's receipts were turned over to him, but he made numerous excuses for not paying any salaries and put them off until the following Saturday night. The next week, Wallace appeared at Miles Bros. Exchange and told the manager that he would pay him the following Monday or if the manager would accompany him to the airdome he would pay him immediately. Of course the manager declared Monday would be soon enough. Saturday night, as before, the entire receipts were turned over to Wallace. That was the last seen of him. Since then Mr. Robertson has been getting bill after bill for repairs to the airdome which the young man ordered and which were not necessary. Mr. Wallace, despite his fine appearance, must be a degenerate, as he has been known to boast many times that he does not have to work to make money.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER

Washington, D. C., Aug. 8, 1911.

Mr. Airey, manager of the Alhambra, has just put on the road what might be termed a circus moving picture show. This will consist of a large tent with a seating capacity of about 300 which will make its journey through the South until November. The films to be especially featured will be the Fall of Troy and the Pirates of 1920, while several other reels will be added to complete the show. The original scheme which Mr. Airey will present is an exhibition of fireworks in connection with the pictures, especially in the Fall of Troy. Precaution has been taken to prevent any fire, as of course this part of the show will not be under shelter. Nor will the audience be bothered with the smoke, as two large fans will blow this into the open. As far as my knowledge goes, this makes the initial use of fireworks with motion pictures. This project promises to be quite a success and will give to the small cities their first glimpse of this new amusement.

Manager Cosgrove, who has a commodious airdrome in the northeast section of the city, is one of the recent entries into this field and he has selected the Independents for his patronage. So well pleased is he with this venture so far that he means to continue the business during the coming winter, when he will either buy or build a house in the fall.

The Princess has the distinction of being the only house running moving pictures in a large radius of the northeast section. Surrounded as it is by airdromes and theaters closed for the summer, Manager Morgan has been able to keep his crowd and make them comfortable with additional ventilators and fans. During a recent cool spell, the Princess worked overtime, for the airdomes were too cool for some. In the fall this house will be renovated and improved, making it more attractive in colors.

"Napoleon and Josephine" has closed a several days' successful run at the Virginia. While this depicts the real love story of the great French general, it also shows that power and will that made France great in his day, only to totter and fall when he was gone. The film, however, is too short and not quite gorgeous enough. To one who has visited Paris and the places made famous during the reign of Napoleon and Josephine, this reel presents something of a disappointment in a subject which is so full of material to be used.

The Virginia has shown a decided leaning toward the classic in moving pictures. Manager Noonan has had all the Shakespearean plays on the first day of release, as well as historical dramas. Most of these have been retained for several days with financial benefit to the house.

The first of the series of photoplays taken at Ft. Myer, just outside Washington, made its debut at the Empress on August 4th, under the title of "The Mascot of Troop C." Of course this appeared on the first day of release, for Manager Notes uses only first-time-shown pictures. Contrary to the opinion of some, the home interest in the picture drew an enormous crowd. During the entire day a number of soldiers from Fort Myer were scattered through the audience, enjoying the show much more than some of the others; while little Buster himself, the Mascot, was filled with childish pleasure while looking at himself on the screen. "I did not know it would turn out so good," he admitted candidly. "You know I never did anything like that before." Occasionally there would be an outburst of laughter, when some member of the troop recognizes himself or his comrade in a rôle so foreign to his usual duties at the Fort. The Solax Company and Director Melville have cause to feel complimented on "The Mascot of Troop C."

Manager Notes has arranged to have the series of military pictures taken at Ft. Myer at the Empress. These will make a Friday feature for several weeks.

The music to be heard at the Empress consists of a trio of some of our best musicians. The instruments are the piano, violin and viola, which make an artistic combination, especially in the overtures from the operas which usually open the various shows.

Manager Moore has added other houses to his chain, one of the latest being the Navy, one of the prettiest theaters in the southeast section of the city. He has also gone into the real estate side of the moving picture business and has bought ground for a future house under his control. This will be something of a model, built with every convenience to patrons and operator; with lights, ventilation, heating and cooling plants after the most modern patterns.

The Columbia Theater turned its auditorium over to the enthusiasts of motion pictures on Sunday last, when Lyman H. Howe's Travel Festival entertained and instructed a vast audience. The chief interest was centered in the Coronation of King George and Queen Mary, which included, beside the royal procession, the week's festivities, which were seen for the first time in this city on this occasion. Visits to other foreign lands were also enjoyed through the motion camera.

To the Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir: In the current issue of one of the magazines, the head of a musical institution for young people makes the statement that "our boys and girls do not frequent such amusements as the five-cent theaters."

The reasons thereof are not mentioned by the philanthropic educator, but his statement does not exactly advertise the moving picture shows. If the readers of the aforesaid article would take the trouble to investigate, they would soon see that the standards of the manufacturers of the picture films are not at fault. Those back of the scenes know that it is the ceaseless endeavor of those engaged in the motion picture business "to make better out of best," in the character of plays, the method of production and the quality of the films and the machines. With the accomplishment of better plays, finer productions and admirable performances, the manufacturers are proving that they are working for ultimate results—to uplift the people, to arouse home ideals, the betterment of character, manners and morals—to make the nation think.

Now then, back of the manufacturers are ideals—that impetus which urges, strives and accomplishes.

Exactly what, however, is back of the manager of the stuffy, ill-smelling, unventilated little theater wherein some of the most wonderful of pictures are exhibited? It looks as if he is prompted solely to get as much as he can and to give as little as the authorities will permit. There is no one to say "You must so build, equip and maintain your theater." Any little old hole, a one-room, one-story building, without an outward or visible sign of a window, or outlet or inlet for air, is good enough, provided it furnishes a fire exit. I'm no prophet. I'm only one of the crowd in the street, but I do say that until the standard of the moving picture theaters is improved, educators will continue to doubt their influence on "our boys and girls."

Somebody, somehow, some way must impress on the managers of the smaller theaters that they will have to do their part in this "uplift" work. Every one of them ought to take at least a correspondence course in "the psychology of surroundings." Of course a five-cent show is cheap. But with effort and understanding cheap things can be made nice in appearance, can have tone, refinement, can be made pleasing to the eye. People carry away mental images of the pictures, ponder in their hearts over the lessons they teach. Should not the theater itself add its quota to the impression of the play? Cleanliness, quietness, nicety, self-control, good breeding? These things are not only due to the people who support the theater. They are due as a setting to the pictures, products that cost so much time, labor and infinite painstaking. I have visited every moving picture show in this city and frankly declare that never again will I make a few of them richer by a nickel of mine. I have too much regard for my good health and my creature comfort.

This sounds like an arraignment but it is not. It is a plea for improvement, for the establishment of standards, for the beautifying of something cheap — for the awakening of ideals.

One obvious reason why the musical educator objected to the five-cents shows lies in the music heard in the majority of moving picture theaters. Why, Oh! why, must it be as it is? Who can think—be inspired—take to heart—make resolutions—when the strum of a noisy piano distracts and spoils the motive as well as the influence of the pictures. Silence in the theaters! Suggestion cannot work in racketty places. Unless soft, appropriate music can be furnished, melodies which are suitable to the character of the pictures, songs that sink into the consciousness and that harmonize, soothe or stimulate, there should be no music. "BILLY" LIPSETT.

LONDON CORRESPONDENT

It was only a week or two ago that I announced the death of Mr. Thomas Clegg and it is again my melancholy duty to record the loss of a member of the trade, Mr. F. A. Fullagar pasing away at Bournemouth, from consumption, on Saturday, July 6th. Though probably not well known on your side, Mr. Fullagar was, some two years ago, a prominent figure in London film circles, when he conducted a business in films, slides, and apparatus in Cecil Court, and at the same time controlled living picture and variety entertainments at the Montpelier, Walworth and the Prince's Hall, Southend. Previously he had been one of the directors of Walter Tyler, Ltd., to which he was introduced by the founder, the late Mr. Walter Tyler, whose nephew he was. Mr. Fullagar's ventures as a showman, owing to various circumstances for which he was not responsible, were unsuccessful and he had lately given up any direct connection with the industry, though he kept in touch regularly with many of his old trade acquaintances, until failing health compelled him, some three months ago, to take up a residence away from London. Unfortunate in his experience of the trade—his hard work had undoubtedly much to do with the success the two halls already mentioned enjoy in other hands—he made many friends among film men, by whom his death is keenly regretted.

COMING IMP RELEASES.

Carl Laemmle Cables to Spare No Pains or Expense in Order to Keep Imp Films Up to the Standard.

While the head of the Imp Company is in Europe combining business with pleasure the heads of the concern in America are carrying out his instructions to the letter. Recently Mr. Laemmle cabled from Carlsbad, Germany, enjoining the superintendent of the studio to spare neither pains nor expense to keep the Imp films up to the standard, "and go them one better" was the parting injunction. Acting on this order there is renewed activity and the watchword is "progress."

Mr. Laemmle only repeated the request made on the deck of the steamer that took him to the continent. His last instructions were to bend every energy to make Imp films the best that talent and money can produce. How well his request has been carried out is best proven by the pictures turned out by a carefully selected corps of superintendents, actors and mechanics. The hustling president of the concern writes from abroad that the European demand for Independent films is increasing and that the future looks bright for the manufacturers and exhibitors who have had the nerve to assert their dependence. His message to the Independent exhibitors is to stand pat; that he sees a great improvement in conditions and is not disturbed by rumors of opposition by mushroom concerns that are irresponsible, inexperienced and only playing on the credulity of the honest exhibitor.

Among the many notable films that have been produced is "By The House That Jack Built," a fairy story, that introduces nearly all the characters in the Mother Goose melodies. It is an ambitious undertaking, involving much time and money, but the result is highly satisfactory. The costumes are elaborate and the scenic effects and settings are gorgeous. There is a pleasing little story running through the film that makes it interesting to the old as well as the young.

A forthcoming comedy, "The Bicycle Bug's Dream," is a companion reel to the "Skating Bug." The lead is taken by the comedian who did the fancy skating in the former picture and he does some hazardous trick riding on a bike that produces admiration as well as laughs.

"By Registered Mail," is a child picture which is considered to be one of the best things ever done by the Imp actors. It has for its theme parental love, and the longing for home and parents, although humble, of a child who is adopted by a wealthy relative and surrounded by every luxury. The story is entirely original in plot and will prove an innovation in the silent drama.

"Through the Air," is an up-to-date story in every respect in that a genuine air ship figures in the story. The race between the aviator and the villain in a motor car is one of the most sensational effects ever produced on the screen. The air ship is manned by an experienced man and the flight is truly marvelous, the camera catching the effect at various stages of the exciting race. How the villain fails to carry out his nefarious scheme, being foiled by the aviator, makes an interesting story. The scenes are Western, in the mining country, and the fortunes of the heroine will be watched with interest.

"A Timely Repentance," shows that moving pictures really accomplish much and lasting good. It is a story of an unprincipled roue who seeks to wreck a home. The woman sees the enormity of her attempted crime and returns home, repentant, in time to greet the husband, who is ignorant of her intended desertion of himself and babe. It is a strong story well told with a convincing moral.

A FEW WORDS WITH A PROMINENT SUFFRAGETTE ON THE SUBJECT OF THE EDUCATIONAL FILM

By Margaret I. MacDonald

We have the opinions of many prominent men in New York City, and throughout the Union, in fact, on the subject of the educational film, but up to the present time the women of the nation have voiced themselves but little. It seems to me an important thing that we should hear what the mothers of the nation have to say on the subject, as they are the nurturers of the children of the nation who are afterwards the men and women of the nation, and eventually the rulers of the nation. With this point in view I interviewed one of our leading women workers—a woman who, through her own personal efforts and influence, raised last year some $60,000 for the benefit of the poor of the East Side, Mrs. Alma Webster-Powell.

I like the woman who has the courage to meet you in a negligee gown, and with her hair still damp from the shampoo, rather than try your patience by keeping you waiting while she makes herself beautiful. However, the strong, determined, intelligent face of Mrs. Webster-Powell needed no artificial assistance to aid it in its natural charm. The moment you are in her presence you feel the atmosphere of enthusiasm, and strength and sympathy which emanates from the woman. She is at once interested in whatever subject you care to discuss with her—a willing listener and sympathizer, and a strong advocate of justice and equality in all ranks of life, and of the various advanced theories which have come before her notice.

When asked for her opinion on the subject of the moving picture and educational films, she looked rather dazed for a moment, not quite grasping for the moment what was required of her. But all of a sudden her dark eyes lighted up. "Oh, I see," she exclaimed, "you want me to tell you whether I approve of them or not? Oh, certainly I do," she continued, not waiting for me to answer the question. "I would use them in every educational institution if I had my way. I would teach the little children in the kindergarten with moving pictures and then right on up through the different grades of the schools—it is the only way to teach children, for what a child sees in a picture it remembers."

Mrs. Powell was very enthusiastic on the subject, and, although she had evidently not been asked to talk about it before, showed signs of having given some solitary meditation to the good which might be effected by means of wholesome and educational films.

"It would be a good thing if the manufacturers would pay some attention to the reproduction of grand opera stories, as well as of the great dramas," she continued, resuming the conversation. "Thousands of students would attend every year in order to familiarize themselves with the themes, and as an aid in the study of the dramatic portion of their work. But they must have competent direction, and competent actors and actresses in order to carry out the idea as it should be carried out—so that the onlooker can get a proper idea of the intelligent interpretation of the piece."

"I once saw the opera 'Faust' reproduced in moving pictures," said Mrs. Powell, after a few moments' silence, "but it wasn't good—it wasn't good in this respect, the stage setting in some of the scenes was not correct. For instance, Marguerite was pictured in a drawing room. This, of course, was ridiculous, and destroyed the usefulness of the film as an educator."

I was glad indeed to hear this noble woman's views on the subject, and I am glad also to be able to tell you that Mrs. Powell is a strong advocate and worker for woman's suffrage, and woman suffrage is a good thing when it is understood. The success of the movement means that in future generations woman will be the helpmate and companion of man—it means that there will be no more "Doll's Houses." Did Ibsen see into the future when he wrote this wonderful play? Suffrage also means that we will have more intelligent mothers, therefore, we will have more intelligent men; and because we have more intelligent men, and more intelligent women rearing our families, and instigating better things, we will have a better and more intelligent government and nation. To keep in a cramped environment the brain of the woman, whose every thought is stamping its impress upon the future moral and mental condition of the unborn child, is a crime to which the greater minds of the world are becoming enlightened to.

Mrs. Powell is also president and founder of the Public Good Society of New York City. Her never-flagging energy is a marvel to all who know her. Besides singing without remuneration for charitable purposes, she is an inveterate student. Having taken during the past year the degree of Master of Arts, she is now studying for her last degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In her home she is besides all this a model mother and wife, leaving little undone that ought to be done. About the end of August Mrs. Powell will leave for Europe, where she is engaged for a concert tour. She will also sing in grand opera in Berlin, returning to her home in Brooklyn some time in December. She is blessed with having the sincere co-operation of her husband in her work, who is able not only to translate for her operas written in other languages, but is an adept accompanist, accompanying her in all her operatic work here in the city.

The Picture Theatre and the Playhouse

The evolution of several theatres—or drama houses as they should be termed—has had a remarkable effect upon various persons who are connected with the drama in London. Mr. Hall Caine has informed an interviewer that if "lessees, managers and authors go on in their present course much longer, in less than ten years half the West End theatres will be shut up or pulled down, or turned into picture theatres." Furthermore, the critic of a daily paper remarks that the "Picture palaces do their unserious work much better than the theatre can." "They," he says, "have machinery which can produce the sterile half-pleasure which serves to fill out the evening of those whose work is exhausting and rather mechanical. They can work on a low level of unconstructive art." Not so the theatre. "It must," explained the critic, "produce good plays or cease to exist," elbowed out of existence in fact by "lower places of amusement" such as picture palaces. "But if the theatre dies, then these other places will, in course of time, die also, for the lower forms of art are fed by the higher."

This critic, however, takes himself, and what he not overcorrectly terms "the higher form of art" far too seriously. The theatre, he complains, is "at the mercy of vanity, egoism, and commercial interests." The public has, we are told, been cheated of art in the theatre, and the result is bad plays.

With all this, however, it is undoubtedly a fact that the picture theatres are affecting materially the attendance at both theatres and music halls, and the proprietors of these, alarmed and amazed, instead of reading and applying the lesson aright, merely descend to vulgar abuse. Accordingly, they dub the picture theatre "low" or describe it as a "lower form of entertainment."

Readers of the "News" are fully aware that the "nickleodeon" has elbowed a great many of the "legitimate" drama house out of existence, or rather "swallowed them up." A similar operation is already in progress in London and the process has every indication to continue with increasing rapidity.

Now let us refer to the opinion of the master of the English drama—Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree. Sir Herbert recently remarked, "I do not see any sign of decay in the British theatre. We have ample evidence here that the public loves good plays, and I believe that things generally are full of promise of a great revival. Personally I believe in the public; I have had failures, but I have never had failures I could not understand. Plays fail because of their shortcomings, never because of their virtues. If the public wants pageant only, it can get it done splendidly in the musical comedy theatres in pantomimes, and in the music halls. My friends come to His Majesty's (Sir Herbert's theatre in London) primarily for the drama and the acting. But I admit that they like to see their drama in a beautiful and appropriate setting. And pray why not?" "Moreover," observed a famous novelist who had been listening to Sir Herbert, "if it is merely beautiful spectacle that is required, the cinematograph theatre can beat any playhouse. What stage can compare for example with the exact photographic reproduction of the waves breaking on the seashore?"

A question was asked if the novelist agreed that the "cinemas" were serious competitors of the theatres. The novelist replied: "No, I think they may be affecting the business of the music halls, but all these places of entertainment encourage the habit of seeing things. The people who go to the picture theatre tonight only come for a change to His Majesty's tomorrow. Moreover, the wordless drama pictured on the screen may stimulate curiosity to see the real drama, and thus the cinematograph may become an actual feeder of the playhouse. . . . A theatre that houses an entirely different company every week is just a lodging house. It has none of the charms of a home. It is a building without personality and without soul. The playhouse that really interests live men and women in London or wherever you will, will always possess individuality. As for the failure of the various London schemes for the production of artistic drama—if they were failures—I think perhaps the range of the repertory has been too narrow. The productions have been too much in one key. . . . find that record successes are scored with such beautiful dramas as Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird." Decidedly I am no pessimist. Perhaps the conditions of the theatre may be modified, but I find progress in all the branches of dramatic art. Above all I am hopeful of the future of the theatre."

Thus are we situated, Cousin America, and these are our opinions, varied though they be—now what of yours? Now, Mr. Saunders, get busy on your Correspondence Column and let us hear what you have to say!

The Power of the Picture

It is but a short time ago since the Illustrated London News was practically the one and only picture paper in the British Isles, and its price was prohibitive save to a limited class. Gradually the demand for picture newspapers arose until now nearly all the existing periodicals or "dailies" are pictorial. The picture conveys to the reader as a coup d'œil a knowledge of some great event or renders him familiar with the features of those men who are making history or leaving their mark on the times in some walk of life or another. Pictorial journalism is in fact one of the characteristics of the present age, and it is no exaggeration to assert that there are picture papers with enormous circulations which are taken in and perused by thousands of persons who gain from them their knowledge of the history of the day, the events of the times, and who have either not the leisure or perhaps the inclination to wade through in print the details of the history or the narrative of the events.

When the historian of the future comes to treat of the social life of the American people at the commencement of the twentieth century, he will not fail to note the extraordinary vogue for picture papers and what may perhaps be deemed in some respects an evolution thereof—the picture theater. In both cases the simplification of mechanical processes and scientific discoveries have aided in the popularization of what are undoubtedly not only valuable means of information and amusement, but of instruction likewise. The flippant, ill-informed and entirely superficial writers who contemptuously deem the picture theater a "passing whim" not worthy of serious consideration on the part of superior persons are only samples of that shallow type of ignorance which obtains in every age and looks askance at anything novel because it is new. There is no doubt whatever that the motion picture has a potential power for the good; it has not only come to stay, but to be a prominent feature of the social life of the people, and in my opinion, and I know that Mr. Saunders and readers will endorse it, that it is proving an educational force of incalculable value. The true fact of the matter is that the utility and the potentialities of the motion picture have up to the present been imperfectly realized, if indeed they have been grasped by the masses to any appreciable extent. The term "moving pictures," which has been so persistently applied to the entertainments in the cinematograph theaters, has, I believe, stood in the way of the mass of the people comprehending the possibilities of the cinematograph, not only as regards the present, but in reference to posterity. There has been, and indeed still is, a disposition fostered by a certain section of the press to look on "moving pictures" as an ephemeral kind of entertainment in vogue for the moment.

By the Coronation pictures the cinematograph theater has been afforded a unique chance of demonstrating in the plainest possible manner that it is not merely the only true recorder of history, but that it serves to bind the whole world closer together, and in a nation to arouse and develop patriotism by awakening and quickening interest—such is the real power of the picture.

The Plaza is one of the latest entries into the Independent field.

THREE EXTRAORDINARY FEATURES

In the current issue of Film Facts, published by the American Film Manufacturing Company, that company describes three Flying A productions, any one of which is sufficient unto itself to raise the general quality of a month's ordinary and mediocre production on the part of a moving picture manufacturer. The features that place these films in a class by themselves are extraordinary to a degree, and are withal extremely sensational and thrilling.

We append herewith a brief resume of the particular features in each of the films referred to above, and which are maintained to be so exceptional.

"The Poisoned Flume."—The story of this film is built around an irrigation flume one hundred miles in length and which supplies El Cajon Valley with water. The flume is a masterpiece in engineering skill, and, in its course through the mountains, it is very often supported on trestlework easily two hundred feet in height.

The chase of the desperado, who on vengeance bent, has poisoned the waters of this flume, thereby killing a goodly number of the cattle owned by his enemy, is extremely sensational. The eventual cornering of the miscreant on the flume itself, and the pitched battle between the desperate man and his pursuers, he hanging virtually in mid-air, and a target for the bullets of the outraged ranchman two hundred feet below, is asserted to be one of the most extraordinary features ever attempted in moving pictures.

"The Brand of Fear."—The climax of this picture is a fierce hand-to-hand struggle on the overhanging lip of a two-hundred-foot precipice. Here the cowboy hero overcomes his desperate rival in a hand-to-hand conflict that is hair-raising in its realism.

The eventual victory of the hero when he at last, by a superhuman exertion, lifts his antagonist high above his head and throws him clear of the rock into a chasm two hundred feet below, is one of the most thrilling and effective climaxes the American Company has ever attempted.

This Flying A film will go down in the history of the picture business as being something out of the usual.

"The Ranch Girl."—The scene of this film in which the ranch foreman, after being outwitted by the outlaws, is gagged and tied in his own corral after being beaten unmercifully, is worthy of note on account of the astoundingly original manner in which the rescue of the foreman is arranged.

Throughout the picture great stress is laid upon the affection of the foreman for his Western pony, and the scene in this film in which this pony, seeing the plight of his master, takes the rope that binds him between his teeth and, after considerable effort, releases him, is one of the most effective pieces of motion picture photography ever projected on the screen.

It is becoming more and more apparent as the moving picture business advances that just as Messrs. Urban and Smith in the discovery of kinemacolor were obliged to backtrack for fifty years of accepted tradition, so also will it be necessary for the operator who intends to remain in the business to look carefully after his P's and Q's.

At the present time, the demand for kinemacolor operators, although not yet enormous, is far in excess of the supply. The idea of the Kinemacolor Company is to be helpful to those who will help themselves, and to put a careful operator on to a thing that will enable him to earn a good salary.

There can be no possible excuse for an operator not understanding the kinemacolor machine. For, owing to the innate simplicity and the common sense of the kinemacolor process, it is possible to explain its principles in print to the mind of the thinking operator, and it will make all the difference in the world to the mind of a man with an eye to becoming a kinemacolor operator.

Mr. J. J. Murdock has a series of articles on projectors and projecting that can be had at the Kinemacolor Company by anyone desirous of profiting themselves in the art of running a projecting machine properly.

Now is the time for operators to call at the kinemacolor offices while the experts are there giving instructions.

APPLAUSE

Does applause show appreciation of a picture, or does the lack of it prove the opposite?

Here is a question which has probably agitated the minds of managers ever since motion picture theaters were established. And the opinions are as diverse as they have been throughout.

Some think applause testifies to the enjoyment or sympathy of the audience. Some think quite the opposite. Perhaps both are right in their conclusions. But audiences differ.

A picture that does not get a hand in New York (in fact, it may be received with what seems like absolute indifference) will be vociferously applauded in some other place. For genuine enjoyment of the pictures the small city or the little town has the large city beaten a block.

New York is not the best critic of a picture. Though, if one is applauded there, it will be almost everywhere else. On the other hand, a picture applauded in a small city or town will scarcely be noticed in a big city.

Again, some managers say that vaudeville is more enjoyed than the pictures because the audience applauds. But this does not follow. The audience applauds vaudeville, it is true, and doesn't applaud the picture. It could be pointed out that an audience will applaud a reader when he gives selections from his books. But it would look silly to most people to applaud that same book if read by one's self. Much the same attitude of mind exists regarding the picture. It is considered, consciously or unconsciously as a species of literary product. The funny ones may be applauded, but the serious ones will not be any more than books are.

Many go away and talk of the pictures quite as they talk about the books they read. But they do not go into foolish ecstacies about them. Quite the contrary. They admire them for their dignity or their instruction or their beauty. And these qualities do not bring handclapping. It gives one a much better idea of the actual feeling of the audience toward a picture to watch their degree of interest. If their attention is upon the screen as long as the picture runs the manager need have no fears about the interest the picture excites. It is plainly manifest. If, however, the attention is wandering, if they look everywhere excepting upon the screen, then it is safe for the manager to assume that the picture is weak.

Managers can tell something by the comments they hear, too. Many people talk about the pictures as they run. Sometimes a party will sit together and one will read the subtitles. This is more beneficial to the manufacturer than the manager. He doesn't make the sub-titles, but maybe he can learn what to select if he listens to the comments. It will be found that these running comments are frequently shrewd criticisms upon the picture as it goes, and the impression it makes upon this or that person who sees it. And clearly an expression of such impression is of value in determining what to select in the future.

Manufacturers would be greatly helped, too, if they sat in the audience for a time and listened to these comments. There would be much of benefit to them all.

But it isn't safe to consider handclapping as a means of knowing whether a picture is popular or not. A good picture is liked by a majority of an audience, even though they may not make a sign. The silent, careful attention is sufficient proof of that. Keep such pictures on the screen and vaudeville would not be required.

"THE BRAND OF FEAR"
American Release Aug. 17th

How little we know even of ourselves. The miracle of motherhood is reverenced by all good men, and the woman about to go into the Valley of the Shadow of Death should be carefully enviroined amid pleasant, wholesome surroundings. Thus will the whole race be benefited and carried forward toward the Divine Ultimate.

Jack Vernon, the sheriff of San Juan County, and his wife are happy in their love and their expectations, when an escaped outlaw steals upon them and fires the fatal shot that plunges their home in gloom leaving Mrs. Vernon a widow. She falls over her husband's lifeless body, unconscious. Later the pre-natal influence has marked her newborn babe with the brand of fear, and he goes through life shunned as a coward, an object of derision to all his companions.

When he becomes a man, the sight of a gun or a knife frightens him and the cowboys, without realizing their cruelty, make him the butt of their jokes. They draw their guns in his presence or threaten him with bowies and laugh boisterously at his terror.

One day they plan to frighten him with a mock hanging, and throwing a rope over a rafter in the barn they place the noose about his neck, when he is rescued by Mildred Clayton, the daughter of his employer. She conducts him to the ranch-house, where he is pleasantly greeted by her father. They are enjoying themselves when Manuel Vak, a Mexican half-breed, comes upon them. Manuel is in love with Mildred and, seeing Jack with her, he becomes jealous of him and grasps Mildred roughly by the arm. Jack starts to remonstrate but the quick drawing of a bowie causes him to retreat in abject terror. Mildred's father comes out and orders Manuel from the place. The hot Castilian blood of Manuel is aroused and he swears to be avenged. Obtaining the assistance of two of his cronies he returns to the ranch and seizes Mildred when she goes to the pump after water. Her screams bring her father to her rescue but he is promptly knocked down and the half-breeds excape taking Mildred with them.

When Jack left the ranch-house he hurried to town disgusted with himself, and a most miserable man, for he has learned to love Mildred and feels that he has disgraced himself forever. The boys gather round him and start to torment him. When the sheriff appears upon the scene, they borrow his badge and place his belt, with guns, around Jack's waist, amid laughter and derisive shouts, "Behold our sheriff." They are enjoying themselves hugely when Mildred's father staggers up and tells them what has happened. The result on Jack is magical; fear leaves him for the counter-brand of love. Mildred, the woman he loves, is in danger. The sheriff reaches for his badge and guns and meets the muzzle pointed squarely at him with the remark: "You've made me sheriff, and I will be sheriff." Backing to his horse, Jack mounts and rides out on the trail alone after the kidnappers. When the cowboys recover from their astonishment they mount and follow. The Mexicans up in the mountains, believing themselves safe from pursuit, camp, leaving Manuel on guard. but Jack has found their trail and, with determination born of his new-found courage, he dismounts and stealthily creeps upon the guard. Dealing him a quick blow from the butt of his gun he releases the girl and they steal away. Mounting the horse together they start down the trail. Jack realizes that they cannot escape on one horse and, dismounting, sends Mildred down the trail to guide the cowboys whom he knows must surely have followed him. Manuel soon recovers from the blow given and, awakening his companions, starts in pursuit. Jack holds the outlaws at bay until he is wounded and then makes his last stand on a rock on the brow of a cliff. Manuel follows him and attempts to shoot but his gun is empty. A fierce hand-to-hand conflict ensues and at last Jack, by superhuman strength, lifts his antagonist high above his head, throwing him clear of the rock into the chasm below. He sinks unconscious on the rocks where Mildred and the cowboys find him.

A film that strikes a new note in picturedom. The story of an honest love overcoming power of pre-natal influence and a subject that is bound to be followed with interest.

"SPORT RESTORES YOUTH"
Itala Release, August 12

A young man is the beneficiary in the will of an aged aunt, and being pestered by his creditors seeks to hasten her demise. To this end he persuades her that sport and exercise will restore her youth. He takes her through a series of violent exercises, boating, horse-back riding, bicycle riding, etc., etc., and the result is that the old lady becomes more sprightly while the exertion and the mishaps which he suffers nearly kills him. He finally gives up, and finds that he has really prolonged the life of the woman.

"THE CANDLE OF LIFE"
Ambrosio Release, August 16

A wonderfully beautiful, artistic subject, showing a woman, disappointed in love, who retires to a convent. Standing before the altar of the Virgin she lights a candle, and as it burns she sees in the flame visions of the different stages of her life. When the candle has burned itself out she falls unconscious, and as the last flicker of the flame dies out the soul is seen to leave the body of the woman. This is a fascinating subject, depicted in most exquisite photography. On the same reel is "The Dread of Microbes," a short comedy, showing the actions of a man who is obsessed with an overpowering dread of the unseen microbes.

"AN INDIAN LOVE AFFAIR"
Bison Release, August 18

This is a four-cornered love story, in which Deerheart and Mona are lovers. Dove-Eye is infatuated with Deerheart, and Eagle-Wing is trying to win Dove-Eye. Thrilling encounters take place between the men, and Dove-Eye's father, the chief, has Deerheart arrested and tied to a stake. Finally, however, Dove-Eye becomes satisfied that she can never win Deerheart's love, and turns to Eagle-Wing. The prisoner is released and turned over to his sweetheart, while the old chief muses upon the strange ways of woman's heart.

"GRANDFATHER"
Reliance Release, August 19

The Reliance release for Saturday, August 19, entitled "Grandfather," contains a most unique plot, based upon the dotage of Grandpa, who childishly secretes some money and his granddaughter's sweetheart is accused of the theft.

Alice Horton has two suitors, Jim Harris and George Blake. She loves George while her father's favorite is Jim. Grandfather, in his second childhood, has a secret spot in the fireplace, made by removing two loose bricks, where he hides all his treasures.

The young people are shown in some beautiful scenes, riding horseback through pretty scenic places. Henry Walthall takes the part of George Blake, the favored suitor, and Mace Greenleaf that of Jim Harris, and the clash of these splendid actors for the affections of the girl lead to interesting scenes.

Mr. Horton goes to his lawyer's office and disposes of a mortgage, receiving cash therefor. Arriving home he places the money in a drawer of his desk, temporarily, Grandpa's childish eyes following his movements. As Mr. Horton leaves the room for a few minutes Grandpa takes the money and slips it in the fireplace, with his other treasures, and then curls up in the corner and dozes.

While these incidents are taking place inside the house, the young people have returned from their ride. George is jealous because Jim has been very polite and attentive to Alice, and when Jim plucks a beautiful rose and hands it to Alice with a flowery compliment George takes it from her hand and dashes it to the ground. His petty jealousy is immediately reprimanded by Alice, and he goes into the house for his hat and crop. As he goes out of the room Mr. Horton comes in, and going to his desk misses the money. George has leaped onto his horse, and with a sharp cut of the whip is galloping away. Mr. Horton calls the young people in and tells them of his suspicions, and Jim helps matters along by advising Mr. Horton to have George arrested at once. Alice indignantly defends her lover, and when her father telephones for the sheriff she mounts her horse and gallops after George. Catching up with him she tells him the story, and he wheels about and rides back to face his accuser.

A stormy scene takes place when George reaches the house, but the circumstantial evidence is so strong that the sheriff arrests him. The men leave the room, and Alice throws herself into a chair and sobs bitterly.

Now, Grandfather, awakened from his sleep, had looked with astonishment at the tempestuous actions, which he does not understand. He asks Alice what it is all about, and she explains to him that George is suspected of taking the money out of the desk. A brightening flash of memory comes over the old man, as he exclaims, "Why, child, I took the money! And I hid it here!"

Alice joyfully flies outside. The sheriff is just starting away with George, but they all turn and come into the house. George is completely vindicated, and Mr. Horton is crestfallen. Manfully, however, he goes to George and says, "My boy, what can I do to wipe out my injustice to you?" George asks for Alice's hand, her father consents, and she is soon snuggling happily in her lover's arms.

"THE COLONEL'S DAUGHTER"

Rex Release, Thursday, August 17

Love is the ruling emotion of the world. And even in military circles, where honor should prevail over all else, love overcomes it. Indeed, if it is true that all is fair in love and war, what setting is more appropriate for a little drama of love and war than a military post?

Lieut. Perry wins the General's daughter, Helen, and Lieut. Thorne, an old enemy and rival, disappointed and defeated, seeks a means of revenge upon the more fortunate suitor. There is to be a military ball at the post that night, and Thorne evolves a shrewd plan of placing Perry in a compromising situation. He goes to an inn of ill repute in the vicinity, and proposes to one of the immoral women, Milly, to attend the ball with him and make a scene involving Perry.

During an interval between dances, Thorne approaches Perry and his sweetheart, and presents his companion to them. Thorne asks Helen for a dance, which is granted, leaving Perry to dance with the hired woman. While they are dancing, Millie feigns faintness, and Perry escorts her to the veranda, where she might get some air. Thorne sees the incident, and grasps the opportunity to tell Helen that he loves her and that Perry is false to her. Helen denounces the slander, and he challenges her to go with him to the veranda and prove his accusation true. She goes. Perry is seen fanning Millie, who seems to have recovered. She asks Perry to sit beside her for a moment. She tells him she loves him, and puts her arms about his neck. Perry, bewildered and astonished, stares at her—but the evil has been done; Helen has seen, and with a breaking heart she re-enters the ballroom with Thorne. A little later, when Perry returns, she spurns him. He tries to explain, but she walks away from him, asking Thorne to see her home.

He who plays with fire will be burned. Millie blackmails Thorne for more money, more and still more. At last he can give her no more, and she threatens to tell Helen all. Thorne, driven to desperation, rifles the safe in the commissary. A soldier detects him in the act, and forces him to replace the money. In the meantime, Millie has carried out her threat and told Helen and the General what she has done. Helen seeks out Perry and—well, just what you expect happens. Once more love has found a way, and once more the old truism that all's well that ends well is borne out.

"THE EDELWEISS" AND "HOW THEY WORK IN CINEMA"

Eclair Release, August 21

"THE EDELWEISS"

Lives are risked daily in pursuit of pleasure, more often to acquire little things of insignificant value.

Louise loved rare flowers, particularly the much-valued Edelweiss, to secure which many lives had been risked and sacrificed.

She had heard and read of these rare flowers and, now that her family were in the vicinity of the mountains, was determined to have a large bouquet for her very own.

Her parents strenuously objected to an ascent of the mountain peak, but suggest sending Henry, the girl's fiancée. But Henry is subject to fits of giddiness and refuses to go until chided by Louise for his lack of bravery. Part way up the mountain, Henry luckily meets a guide returning from a similar quest and succeeds in purchasing a part of his flowers. Then he returns in triumph to Louise, who is greatly overjoyed. His pleasure is short-lived, however, for suddenly the guide appears and accuses Henry of giving him a spurious coin. Louise is much enraged and decides to make the journey herself, accompanied by the guide, from whom Henry made his purchase.

The latter, heartily ashamed of himself, determines to redeem if possible his lost ground and hurriedly takes another path toward the same goal. Fortunately Henry reaches there first and is able to surprise Louise when she arrives. She accepts his offering of Edelweiss and all is forgiven.

"HOW THEY WORK IN CINEMA"

Dissatisfied with the new director, all employees of a large Motion Picture enterprise decide to go on a strike. In spite of entreaties they leave the studio in a body, thinking to cripple the concern. But the ingenious director was prepared for every emergency and by means of a wonderful electrical invention demonstrated his ability to stage an entire production without the aid of human assistance.

Automatically the stage is prepared for the scene, while furniture fittings and decorations mysteriously take their proper places.

Mechanically perfect artists appear before the camera and enact the drama, in short the picture is finally made in time for release on the advertised date.

"BILL TRIES TO MAKE BREAD"

Released August 18

Bill learns with great dismay that the bakers of Paris are on strike, and after receiving practical proof that it is impossible to obtain even a small quantity of the "staff of life," he determines to make his own bread. With that object in view, Bill purchases two large bundles of wheat, and returning to his room commences to wield a flail with all his might. Unfortunately his energy results in a portion of the floor giving way, much to the discomfort and annoyance of the occupants of the room below—a choleric old gentleman and his pretty daughter. The former expostulates with Bill, who, by the way of reply, puffs a quantity of flour in his direction and father and daughter beat a hasty retreat. To add to their troubles, Bill commences to add water for the purpose of kneading, and a cooling shower descends upon the unlucky pair. Two policemen are hastily summoned, and the party descend upon Bill, who manages to liberally bespatter everything and everybody with paste before he is marched off to the station.

"A CHILD'S COURAGEOUS ACT"

This is a strong drama of a novel character which is sure to make an instant appeal to any class of audience, both for its realistic acting and staging, and on account of the sustained interest of the story, which is never allowed to flag for a moment.

Two thieves plot to possess themselves of a consignment of money which is being sent by train. They accordingly present themselves at a lonely house on the line, kept by a woman who works the signals, and ask for shelter. They are admitted and presently, while the signalwoman is dozing in her chair, they attack her and leave her senseless on the floor; not however, without the incident being witnessed by their victim's little daughter, who stealthily creeps from the house without attracting their notice. The villains then proceed to the railway line, where they lay an enormous log across the track with the intention of wrecking the train. Meanwhile the child has gone to meet the express, which she knows is due. Standing in front of the advancing engine without flinching, she succeeds in bringing the train to a standstill, and, in response to the angry questions of the driver and passengers, she leads them to the spot where the trap has been prepared. The robbers are discovered hiding in a thicket nearby and are quickly captured, whilst the little one is taken home to her mother, who is rescued from her plight by the grateful travelers the child has saved.

"BILL FOLLOWS THE DOCTOR'S ORDERS"

Released August 25

Bill consults his medical man, the latter's prescription being "more exercise." Bill does not mind, and promptly purchases a Sandow developer with which to carry out the doctor's commands conscientiously. He is delighted with the instrument, and hastens to affix it to the wall in his bath room. But he unfortunately upsets the bath in his efforts, and is forced to retire downstairs, where he tries the door-handle, with no better results, however, as the strain is too great and he is propelled with much force into the middle of a party of people feasting inside the room. Not seriously damaged, William picks himself up and seeks exercise out of doors. He fixes the elastic developer to the back of a motor, and is enjoying a free and original ride through the town when a policeman intervenes. A railway train and a river dredger complete Bill's list of experiences for the day, and also bring to a finish this most amusing and original of films.

"WHAT A PENNYWORTH DID"

Tim is leisurely dragging out a mournful tune from a hurdy-gurdy, placed outside a cabinet-maker's shop, with the result that the proprietor finds his workman three parts asleep. The maids employed in shaking mats are also very sleepily inclined, so much so that the cabinet-maker drags Tim and his instrument of torture off to the nearest cafe. Here Tim is much interested in a machine giving electrical "shocks," and invests in a "pennyworth." The result is startling in the extreme. Tim drags his hurdy-gurdy back to the workshop and plays for all he is worth, the employees setting about their tasks with a rapidity that leaves nothing to be desired. The maids perform wonders with the carpets, marketwomen stop their bargaining and join in a wild jig, while a party of sandwichmen perform curious evolutions in the street. Even the tables and the chairs outside a cafe are not immune from the charm of music, and after a curious waltz dash away in all directions. The horses and cabs on a rank also join in, while Tim turns and turns. Finally he is escorted to the police station, where police and commissioners alike join in, Tim taking advantage of their dancing to leave, still holding his beloved hurdy-gurdy.

"BATTLE OF THE WILLS"

Imp Release August 21st

Laura Danvers, a handsome young woman, is the betrothed of Dr. Roy Crawford, a young physician who is practicing in the West.

She is also loved by Pierre Rameau, a hypnotist, who places the girl under his influence at will, enjoying the diversion.

Doctor Crawford comes for the girl to take her to his home and make her his bride. He leaves the room, forgetting his hat, after being repulsed by Laura, who is under the spell exerted over her by the unprincipled Rameau. He upbraids his sweetheart, whose sudden revulsion of feeling has mystified him. Going out he sees Rameau, through the French window in the act of bringing Laura once more under his influence.

It all dawns upon the young physician and he hastily returns and throttles Rameau, threatening to kill him, but Laura interferes. She has regained her senses and Dr. Crawford announces that he has made a study of hypnotism, and, not being clear as to the relations between Laura and Rameau, he forces him to enter into a contest to see which possesses the greater power.

The two men exert their influence and Laura is attracted to her sweetheart and he takes her in his arms. Bidding her leave the room, Crawford hypnotizes the Frenchman and leaves him writhing in agony.

"LOVE IN A TEPEE"

Hyacinth is the beautiful daughter of old Bad Eye, a dissolute Indian.

The girl is loved by Jack, a dashing young cowboy, and Manuel, a Mexican. She loves the cowboy and hates the greaser.

Bad Eye spends the major portion of his time at a groggery and Manuel buys him drinks, being the favored suitor for the hand of the daughter. Hyacinth repulses Manuel and he resolves to abduct, take her to his tepee and compel her to love him.

Bad Eye returns to his tent and routs the girl out of the cot, rolls up in the blankets and proceeds to sleep off the effects of his debauch. Hyacinth goes to find her cowboy lover.

In the meantime Manuel repairs to the tepee and, seeing Bad Eye sleeping, proceeds to carry out his purpose. Stealthily stealing in, he takes the old Indian, wrapped in the blanket, and places him on his horse and gallops furiously away.

Jack and Hyacinth start out to find her father, missing him from the tent, and they are led to the home of Manuel. Peeping in they see the Mexican in the act of awakening the sleeping form which he supposes is that of the girl. Old Bad Eye rolls out and immediately asks for whiskey and Manuel is given the laugh by Jack and his sweetheart, who are unable to suppress their merriment.

"AS A BOY DREAMS"

Imp Release August 24th

Jack Howard, a typical American boy, is addicted to reading literature of the yellow-backed variety, despite the admonitions of his father. The mind of Jack is inoculated with the spirit of adventure and he yearns for some opportunity to make a reputation. He is times by his parent, who is matter-of-rudely brought back to earth several fact and endeavors to turn the thoughts of the youth in the right channel. Jack has his store of cheap novels in the garret and repairs there to read of deeds of valor and of adventure.

One day he dozes off to sleep, after devouring a thrilling story of the sea. The story of his dream is told in detail.

While walking on the dock he is seized upon by some sailors and shanghaied in the most approved manner, being taken aboard a ship bound on a long cruise. He is secreted and overhears a plot of the sailors to mutiny, seize the ship and sail to a desert island in search of a treasure. One of the sailors produces a chart of the island and the tars leave the forecastle. Jack comes on, takes possession of the paper and is joined by the winsome daughter of the captain. It is a case of love at first sight. He shows her the chart and she takes him to her father, where he discloses the plot of the mutineers.

The desperate men attack the captain and the loyal members of the crew and there is a fierce fight. Jack saves the captain's daughter, who escapes with him in the garb of a boy. They take possession of a small boat and put to sea, where they are captured by pirates. The sex of the girl is discovered, but Jack secures immunity for himself and fair companion by showing the pirates the chart of the treasure island.

The pirates go to the island, taking Jack and the girl with them, unearth the treasure and are jubilant, but their joy is shortlived, as they are in turn set upon by another gang of pirates and the struggle is a bloody one. Jack and the girl are subsequently rescued from the pirates by the father of the girl and his gallant crew and taken aboard his ship, together with the treasure, which is Jack's by right of having the chart. Jack asks the captain for the hand of the daughter and the mariner is only too pleased at the prospect of the union. They are wed and Jack awakens to find it all a dream and he is in despair.

His reflections are rudely broken into by his father, who hauls him out of the garret and sets him at the irksome task of sawing wood.

"THE CROSS"

Thanhouser Release August 22d

"The mistakes that doctors make are buried in the ground," W. S. Meriwether, the nautical writer says. "Those made by lawyers are paid for by their clients, but the mistakes of sea captains are paid for by themselves.

The captain in our story pays such a price. With one officer sick, he is standing watch with his first mate, when his love for drink leads him to neglect his duty. While the ship is plunging to destruction, the captain, who should have been on the bridge, is below in his stateroom, helpessly intoxicated. The ship founders, and the captain and his first mate are the only ones who are saved.

The luckless commander is placed on trial for the deaths of his men. The evidence of his mate counts heavily against him, and he is sent to prison for a term of years. His wife, who stands by him during the trial, prays for him in vain, and when the jury returns its verdict she hands him her golden cross, hoping that in his cell he may yet find comfort and consolation in religion.

The cross, which is taken from him when he is received at the prison, is restored to him on his release. He is then broken hearted and embittered. His wife has died during his absence; his prospects are blighted, and the only thing that keeps him up is a desire to be revenged upon the man he unjustly blames for his misfortunes.

So he hunts him out, and when they meet he greets the mate with every evidence of friendship. The mate, a good-hearted chap, is sorry for his old commander, and only too ready to extend him a helping hand. He invites him to his home, and it is his intention to see that the captain's remaining days are free from care and worry.

Although the captain is cunning enough to conceal from the mate his feeling of fanatic hatred, his secret is partially revealed to a visitor at the mate's home, the parish priest. The clergyman meets him at the mate's home, and the captain's conduct worried him. The priest leaves the house in deep thought. He ponders over the problem on his way home, then decides to return to the house. He is just in time to save the mate's life, the captain being about to kill him.

When the priest suddenly appears before the captain, holding out the cross toward him, the would-be assassin thinks of his wife, and for the first time realizes the crime he would commit. He sees that the punishment he has suffered is the consequence of his own fault, and he sinks at the priest's feet, begging forgiveness for the crime he had been about to commit.

The priest, finding that his repentance is sincere, secures him a refuge in a monastery. There, by prayers and good deeds, he is trying to atone for the faults he committed in this world, so that he may meet the one he loved in eternity.

"THE ROMANCE OF LONELY ISLAND"

Thanhouser Release August 25th

A successful young author has sketched out a book which hugely pleases his publishers, but the trouble is that he cannot seem to write it. He knows what he wants to say, and just how to say it, but he is annoyed by callers, who bother him on all sorts of subjects. Finally in despair he decides to go into the wilderness, where no one can annoy him. He owns a little islet, known as Lonely Island, and there he goes, determined to spend the summer in solitude, and complete his work.

The first thing he does is to put up a sign, warning all trespassers not to land. Then he lives a happy outdoor life, and congratulates himself on the success of his plan.

If a certain pretty young woman had been an accomplished sailor, or rather "sailoress" the solitude of the island's owner might never have been disturbed. But this girl, who generally had her own way, decides to sail a boat, and induces an old boatman to let her take one of his crafts out all alone.

Of course, she upsets the boat, but, with her usual luck, is not drowned. She manages to clamber to the top of the overturned boat, and placidly waits future developments, confident that everything will come out all right. And, although Cupid has never been pictured as a Sea God, it must have been him who guides the vessel to Lonely Island.

The girl gets ashore there, and after a very brief investigation finds a cute little camp, where she discovers dry clothes and warm drink and food. So she makes herself very much at home, and, when the rightful owner come along, she greets him pleasantly. She offers him some coffee, and when he sullenly refuses she gives him one of his own blankets, and tells him he can sleep out under the trees. Then she placidly goes to sleep in his comfortable tent. In the morning she provides an excellent hot breakfast, made from his own provisions, and when rescue comes a little later thanks him for his delightful hospitality and sails away, as placidly content as ever.

The girl does not know that she has been a nuisance. And the more the man thinks about it, the more he believes that she was not. For the average man likes to be bossed gently, although he may not always admit that such is the fact.

The young author decides to see the girl again. He calls; she receives him pleasantly. He becomes more and more impressed. And then—well——

There used to be a sign on Lonely Island reading "TRESPASSERS, KEEP OFF." But the girl who always has her own way superintends the installation of a new sign which reads "This Island For Sale." For the young author has decided that loneliness is no longer to be a part of his life, and that when the right girl comes along it is time for a man to buy an engagement ring.

"COLLEEN BAWN"

Yankee Film Company Release Aug. 21st

A film portraying the famous Irish story, exactly as produced by Dion Boucicault and Laura Keene in 1860.

"Colleen Bawn"

Oh, Limerick is beautiful, as everybody knows,
The River Shannon's full of fish, beside that city flows;
But it is not the river, nor the fish that preys upon my mind,
Nor with the town of Limerick have I any fault to find.
The girl I love is beautiful, she's fairer than the dawn;
She lives in Garryowen, and she's called the Colleen Bawn.
As the river, proud and bold, goes by that famed city,
So proud and cold, without a word, that Colleen goes by me!
Oh, hone! Oh, hone!

Oh, if I was the Emperor of Russia to command,
Or, Julius Caesar, or the Lord Lieutenant of the Land,
I'd give up all my wealth, my manes, I'd give up my army,
Both the horses, the fut, and the Royal Artillery;
I'd give the crown from off my head, the people on their knees,
I'd give my fleet of sailing ships upon the briny seas,
And a beggar I'd go to sleep, a happy man at dawn,
If by my side, fast for my bride, I'd the darlin' Colleen Bawn.
Oh, hone! Oh, hone!

"RETALIATION"

Yankee Film Co. Release August 25th

A modern pictorial version of the famous lines by Congreve—

"Heaven hath no rage like love to hatred turned,
"Nor Hell a fury like a woman scorned."

The story tells of the extreme measures a woman will adopt to revenge herself upon the man who left her for another.

Unable to wreak her vengeance upon the artist who spurned her and married another, she waits five long years with the memory of the insult fresh in her mind, and seeks other channels and strikes at him through his younger brother.

The former model has become a famous actress and among the playwrights who seek her is the brother of the man who had spurned her. It is an easy matter for the famous actress to make a slave of the young author and when he has introduced her to his family as his fiancee she meets the elder brother. now a happily married man, and tells him that she is only playing with the affections of his younger brother. "As you have made me suffer, I shall make you suffer through the love you bear for your brother; as you cast me off, so shall I cast him off."

The innocent victim of this woman's vengeful spirit is an unwilling listener to this denouncement and realizing how his life has been blasted by his love for this woman falls unconscious at her feet.

"WHEN NORTH AND SOUTH MET"

Champion Release August 21st

The battle of Manassas Junction has gone down in history as most remarkable in many respects. Twice on the same ground the armies of the North and South met in deadly conflict—brother fighting against brother.

In the first of the two great battles, both sides were new to the terrors of war and the flame of conflict, yet never was struggle more gallantly maintained nor carried on with more martial ardor. But in that first great scene of slaughter, something terrible happened. The Northern troops right in the flush of victory were stampeded like sheep—were driven across Bull's Run, on through Centerville and into the city of Washington. The battle has gone down in history as Bull's Run; it was dubbed facetiously by a French writer as Cow's Run.

In this film story, Harry Hilton is a participant on this famous field where so many deeds of daring and heroism took place. Harry was no exception in this respect for at the risk of his own life he saved that of a gallant Confederate lieutenant, and these two became fast friends forever more.

But after many terrible encounters, Harry himself was mortally wounded on this bloody field of Chantilly; and the fortunes of war had so ordained that his last dying breath was gasped forth on the bosom of that man whose life he had saved at the beginning of the great strife. And into the keeping of this brave lieutenant Harry gave letters and keepsakes for his precious mother and sister up in the North. And then, when the war ended, the lieutenant came.

Grace Hilton imaged her brother in the eyes of the handsome Southern officer, and the love that had grown in his bosom for the dead youth was now flamed into a passion for the sister who was pure and holy.

The love scenes between these two are good to look at. Nothing mawkish or cheaply sentimental. There is in it that true touch of nature that makes the world dim. No better story of love and valor has been put forth in any photoplay within a decade.

"THE CONFESSIONAL"
Champion Release August 23d

The aristocratic parents were opposed to the obscure clergyman, and only reluctantly assented to his attentions toward their daughter. On a certain day, in their beautiful suburban village, a daring robbery was attempted and one of the culprits took refuge in the rectory—the clergyman's home. In chasing the robbers, the girl's father found a robber's mask on the steps of the rectory, but could not gain entrance thereto.

His suspicions were aroused, and finding that the old gentleman, whose home was entered, had been wounded, he got the vestry together, he called on the clergyman for an explanation of the "mask mystery" or the latter's resignation. During the controversy his eyes lighted on a revolver with one chamber discharged. Slipping away, he sought the wounded man's home and, borrowing the bullet which had been extracted from his wound, he found that it fitted the revolver.

He now confronted the young clergyman with this double proof of knowledge of the affair. The latter refused to utter a word, saying his lips were closed by "the seal of the confessional." The young girl now demanded a clean breast of it or to cancel their engagement. His only answer was that under the seal he was protecting "a brother." He didn't tell her that it was HER brother whose confession he had heard, and who was now on his way West, to grow up a better man.

After the break, the clergyman, upheld by his bishop, went to a Western mission. The boy in the meantime had become a ranch foreman, and was soon to marry the daughter of the ranch owner, whose life he had saved from bandits. The happy sequel was to find fruition in this marriage, to which the young man's parents and sister had been invited.

All are now present. The priest arrived to officiate—but, the father and daughter pointed the finger of scorn at him. But the bridegroom stepped forward and exonerated him, at the same time confessing his part in the affair. Father and daughter now appeal to the priest for pardon. The daughter would throw herself into his arms, but it is too late. He had taken the vow of celibacy. His bride was the CHURCH. He then tied the knot for the happy couple.

"HANDS ACROSS THE CRADLE"
Nestor Release August 16th

Happily the two old comrades clasped hands, for Col. Clay and Maj. Wells had soldiered side by side in the Civil War, and ever since had been friends and neighbors. Now their fondest hopes were about to be realized in the marriage of their son and daughter.

Unfortunately, however, ere Kitty had half completed her trousseau, her father received a letter from his attorney, stating that the tract of land sold by Col. Clay to the Railroad Company for the proposed cut-off, would bring the roadbed within two hundred yards of his house.

Surprised and angry that his neighbor had not found this out before selling his property, the Major hurried over to the Clay home, where, owing to the high temper of the two veterans, a stormy interview took place, ending in the Major throwing away his daughter's engagement ring and forbidding Robert the house.

It was then that the women decided to take a hand; so, while Kitty and Robert were planning their future, Mrs. Clay and Mrs. Wells hastily made arrangements for their children to be married that night, and as soon as they were made man and wife, quietly escorted them to the train, which was to carry the bride and the groom to their new home.

Two years passed, yet, despite the pleadings of their wives, and even the mention of a little grandson in the letters from Kitty and Robert, the old comrades remained obstinate.

Urged by their own homesickness, as well as by the wishes of their mothers, the young people were only too glad to return when they learned from Robert's agent that he had been able to purchase the little cottage for them adjoining the Clay property.

The day after their arrival, unable to resist the temptation of taking just one peep at what Mrs. Wells termed "that blessed baby," the Major, after assuring himself that his daughter and her husband were not in the house, stole softly into the cottage and had already won the marked approval of the tiny boy when he heard someone approaching. Slipping behind a screen, the Major was dumbfounded to behold his neighbor, evidently bent upon the same errand as himself.

Coming down to the Colonel, as he bent over the little chap, the Major silently held out his hand, which, when he recovered from his surprise, was only too gladly clasped by the old-time comrade.

"MUTT AND JEFF IN THE BANKING BUSINESS"

At last the two inseparables, Mutt and Jeff, have struck it rich. They have real money, and as is often the case with people unaccustomed to hear the joyful jingling of the "vile metal" or feel the cold-warm touch of the "mazuma," neither Mutt nor Jeff knows what to do with their suddenly acquired riches. Being on Easy Street for the time being, they plan innumerable plans to remain on that comfortable road for the balance of their mortal existence.

Mutt, whose "thinkatorial" apparatus is of the quick lunch order, is the recipient of one lightning inspiration after another, which rotund little Jeff dashes to the ground in his stubborn, slow manner. Mutt finally asserts his six feet or more of lissome build—for no regiment of Jeffs can tell him that there is anything more profitable than the banking business. Reluctantly the little fellow joins his tall partner in a banking venture, hoping against hope that the enterprise might prove a success.

Depositors are hard to find; at least none stray into the banking office of Mutt & Jeff Co. This lack, however, is more than made up by clients wanting to borrow money for a limited length of time and offering big bonuses and splendid real estate for security. No such golden opportunity can give Mutt the go-by. Brushing aside his little partner's objections, Mutt quickly lends out all the bank's cash, and already rejoices over the big haul he soon expects to make.

Borrowers, as a rule, are very forgetful folks, and the ones who clean out the Mutt & Jeff bank are the rule and not the exception—they are even worse, as Mutt finds out when, tired of waiting for the return of the bank's money together with the alluring bonuses, he decides to go and take possession of the mythical land, houses, etc., given as security. The bank is busted, Mutt is busted, and Jeff is both busted and sore. Stunned by the sudden termination of his dream of gold, poor Mutt fails to see the frowning countenance of his diminutive chum, and from somewhere, somehow, comes another unexpected blow, and, alas! the tall ex-banker is busted again!

"THE VICTORY OF LOVE"
Great Northern Release August 19th

Two partners in business have to admit to one another that prospects look very black for them, and that they are on the eve of bankruptcy. A former associate to whom they owe considerable money writes that he will forego his claim if the hand of the daughter of one of the partners is given him in marriage. The partner persuades that the match be brought about, but the father resists his persuasions, and at home is on the point of committing suicide when his daughter comes in. Seeing what he is about to do, she rushes forward and he finally shows her the letter. An aunt brings her powers of persuasion to bear, and the girl, although she has a sweetheart, consents to marry the suitor, realizing that by her doing so, she will save her father from ruin. All preparations for the wedding have just been completed, and the ceremony is about to take place when the real lover arrives. He creates a scene, and attempts to end his life, but fortunately only inflicts a slight wound. The girl's father, seeing her distress, determines that she shall have the man she loves, and resolutely calls off the wedding, giving his blessing to the true lovers, and avowing that he will get out of his troubles as a man should.

"THE PHONEY RING"
Solax Release August 16th

Mary is industriously scrubbing the office floor as Mr. Franklin, her boss, enters. Seeing what a good worker Mary is, Franklin decides to give her a present. He buys a cheap ring and, leaving it on his desk as he goes to the outer office, his wife enters and, seeing the ring, and thinking that it is for her birthday present, slips it in her bag. When Franklin gets home he is surprised at the greeting which he receives from his wife and, upon asking her the cause for her affectionate demonstrations, is told how thankful she is for his thoughtfulness. Mr. Franklin can hardly contain himself with mirth and as Mrs. Franklin gives a party to her friends to show off her new jewelry, Mr. Franklin rushes out of the house to get a good ring to take the place of the cheap one. He returns, but not in time for the party. Mrs. Franklin's friends laugh at her, telling her the ring is paste, and in a rage she throws the ring on the table. Franklin puts the good ring in the place of the other, but Mrs.

Franklin, not knowing of the change, takes the ring and throws it out of the window. After many experiences, the ring is finally returned to its rightful owner, and Mrs. Franklin is again made happy.

"LET NOT MAN PUT ASUNDER"

Solax Release, August 18th

The story opens with a court-room scene, showing a divorce case in progress. John Mills gets a divorce from his wife, Mary, and the court decides to give his son into his care, while the mother is given the little daughter. Mary and daughter go back to their old home in the country while father and son stay in the city. The children divide their toys, among which are two white pigeons. Time passes and Mary's old mother dies. The shock proving too much for Mary, she is taken ill and is at the point of death. Little Helen is shown sitting sadly by the bedside of her dying mother, not knowing what to do. Finally we see her sad little face light up with a bright idea. She takes her little pigeon and, tying a note to its leg, lets it out of the window.

Mr. Mills is shown sitting sadly in his city home with his son by his knee. His attention is attracted by a tapping on the window, and arising and opening the window, he is surprised to see a pure white dove flutter into the room. Taking the bird in his hands he finds a note written in a childish hand and addressed to him. The note is an appeal for help from his little daughter. Heartbroken at the condition in which he sees his family is placed, he gets the first train to his wife and child. During a pretty scene the family is happily reunited.

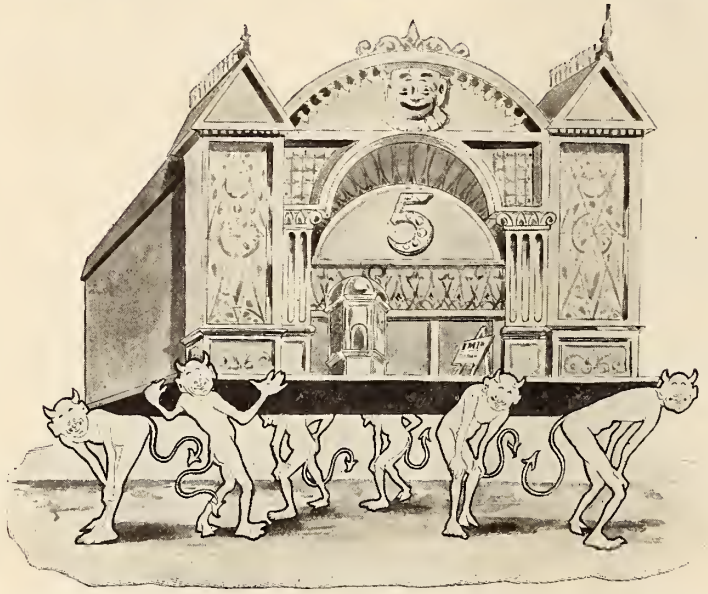
IMPS will support your theatre



You ought to know as well as we do that the more Imps you use the bigger business you'll do. This being the case, how can you rest easily until you've got your exchange into the habit of sending you TWO Imps every blessed week of the year? Give this a little serious thought and then get busy. See what's coming now:

"BATTLE OF THE WILLS"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

One of the most unique half-reels we ever produced; the sort that makes people talk and think long after they've seen the film. Read the synopsis carefully. On the same reel you'll get a comedy called which looks like a genuine out-and-out "western" film at first but winds up in a scream. Go after it. This and the "Battle of the Wills" will be released Monday, Aug. 21.

"LOVE IN A TEPEE"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

"AS A BOY DREAMS"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

This is simply great! Read the synopsis and see if this boy's dreams are not exactly like the ones you used to have when you were a kid. See if this film doesn't carry you back to your wild and wooly days when you thought ou were a regular devil of a hero. No better Imp than this was ever made. Go after it hammer and tongs. It will be released THURSDAY, Independent Moving Pictures Co. of America. 102 W. 101st St., New York. Carl Laemmle, Pres. Are you getting our free lobby circulars? Have you sent $5 for our Imp Photo-Frame?

ASK YOUR EXCHANGE FOR THE IMP SPECIAL RELEASE, "ELKS AT ATLANTIC CITY." Feature it for all you are worth!

Sold through Motion Picture Dist. & Sales Co.

Listen!

Many Independent exhibitors who are 'way, 'way out of the territory covered by my various offices are renting their films from me because they'd rather deal with a sure thing far away than with an uncertainty nearer home! That's pretty good proof that the famous "Laemmle service" is all that it's cracked up to be. Why don't you try it?

HERE'S A TIP!

A WILD CAT PROPOSITION IS ON THE CHASE AGAIN. Listen not to alluring propositions of floating stock on a proposed market, advertisements of a complete program, etc., never heard of before, as insecure as a marsh meadow. A WRONG STEP AND YOU ARE SWAMPED.

We have devoted years, employed many brains and spent big money to make the Independent market what it is to-day. WE HAVE FOUGHT YOUR WAY THROUGH ALL LEGAL CONTROVERSIES, AND LAUNCHED YOU SAFELY ON SOLID GROUND WHERE WE STAND TO-DAY AS STRONG AS THE ROCK OF GIBRALTAR. WE ALWAYS HAVE HELD AND ALWAYS SHALL HOLD OUR BUSINESS ON THE MERIT OF OUR GOODS.

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

SCENES FROM "ROMEO AND JULIET"

RELEASED TUESDAY, AUG. 29
A City Chap's Adventure in the Country

The Moth

in this story was not associated with the proverbial Flame—just Smoke. And where there was smoke there WASN'T fire—also in contradiction of a proverbial phrase. The picture deals with the folly of jumping at hasty conclusions, especially if you're a city man in the country and keen to "show" the yokels. Our hero was such and he got long, lingering laughs for his pains. Book the reel and join in the laugh!

No. 241. Code Word, Moth.

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPT. 1
Part One

Romeo and Juliet

By WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Each part is so constructed that it tells a complete story on its own account. Giving a half-hour's show as the two parts do when used together, they will enable exhibitors to give a "Romeo and Juliet Night" that affords all manner of opportunity for feature advertising. Many managers will use them as they appear for the first showing, and book them together for the return date. As the depiction of "the greatest love story of all" and a classic of the highest type, the subject is one that you can make your theatre remembered by.

WANTED, 10,000 SUBSCRIBERS

MANY letters from various pleased readers are on our desk, and on looking through the files we found a sufficient number of laudatory comments to fill two or three issues of the News. It is so easy to print what one's friends say about our efforts, and they are very much appreciated by ourselves, and if we can find any moving picture man in the whole of the United States of America who does not know of the News, we want him to know it now.

We have on our mailing list 12,800 odd names, who are connected with the industry in some one form or another; 2 000 at least of these are writers of scenarios, 5,300 are proprietors of moving picture houses, the remainder are divided amongst employers, operators, camera men, dark room men, etc., and it is our aim to get 10,000 additional subscribers for the Moving Picture News this year.

We fully believe that if once a man subscribes to the News he never drops his subscription, and to make them interested readers, we want everyone who is not already a subscriber to send us in twenty-five cents and we will mail him the News to the end of the year. We are doing this at a loss, but we feel it would be a good investment by creating an interest among the non-subscribers. On another page will be found a form of which we would like at least 5,000 mailed within the next week, and what is more, we are going to get it. Who will be first to look up a quarter and send for a four months subscription to the only paper that is Independent of any Trust, Independent in Politics of the trade, Independent in principle, a paper for all live, awake exhibitors—The Moving Picture News.

THE VALUE OF THE NEWS

THOSE of our readers who took the trouble to read our report of the proposed fire rules of New York City will have noticed one very special item therein reading as follows:

> The commission displayed lively interest in the fire figures Mr. Graham quoted from a recent issue of the Moving Picture News. The board was particularly concerned in the statement that in New York City in 1910 out of 4,032 recorded fires but two were caused by cinematograph films, and these resulting in infinitesimal damage. General Eaton asked that Mr. Kelley be sent for, but the inspector of combustibles, on his appearance, was not prepared to dispute the statement. He said, however, the chief danger lay in fires adjacent to buildings in which films were stored.

The News is looked upon as being the leading cinematograph paper in the industry. Our quotations and statements are used by the Press throughout the world as accurate on the motion picture industry, and whenever we make a statement we are certain of it being quoted so that we verify all data before putting into our columns.

One exhibitor wrote to us the other day, saying that if he had to take a choice of every paper he read, that choice would be the Moving Picture News, as it was worth more to him in dollars and cents, or he might say gold dust, than the paper weighs each week. Another subscriber thinking his subscription had run out, sent us a wire to immediately mail on the News. Another sent us a night letter, all of which is very pleasing to us as showing the position we occupy.

Again, from advertisers we are receiving very flattering letters showing their appreciation of the value of the News to them. This is what we desire more than anything else, and if everyone of our readers replying to advertisements will only mention the Moving Picture News, it will be adding double value as an advertising medium, and to further show our readers how much we value their welfare, and our reputation, we received from a notorious duper of film a half-page advertisement with the cash for insertion in the News. So misleading was the matter that for the protection of our readers we absolutely refused to handle any such advertising from any such people, believing it is to the best interests of the industry to exclude such advertising from trade papers, and any honorable man who does not value dollars more than his soul would see that his paper was clear and free from all such deceitful elements.

THE FILM DUPER

FOLLOWING along the same lines as above, we would caution our readers against putting their trust in associations formed by the what we may term outcasts of Film Society. Cinematography in England, as touched upon by our English correspondent, is in the throes of a fight with that dishonest group of men who are trying to live upon the work and brains of geniuses. These vampires are being supplied with film by this group of associates in America, against whom we warn our readers. These men have no scruples; they are well known to the majority of our readers. Their history, as wreckers and pirates of the industry, has been recorded in our columns many times. They secure film in advance for importation, well knowing the purpose it is to be put to. In like manner, sample prints of the films of European manufacturers are brought over by these so-called associations of importers and manufacturers, and in the vicinity of West Broadway, 36th Street, 45th Street, and Nassau Street, their nefarious practices are carried on in New York. In Philadelphia and Chicago similar tactics prevail. It is this class of men who are trying to get into cinematography "over the wall" instead of through the front gate. Some of these men have wrecked businesses in which thousands of dollars were invested, feathering their own nests with their dupes' dollars.

We want, in this connection, to refer our readers to our remarks in last week's issue of the News entitled "Dubious Prospects." We cannot too strongly impress these truths on our readers' minds. At present there are only two honorable sources of film supply, viz.: The Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Co. (who stand supreme to-day owing to the manner in which they have advanced and for the victories they have obtained for the exchangeman and exhibitor), and the Motion Picture Patents Co. (comprising, as our readers well know, the older firms in the industry). Any foreign manufacturer putting trust in any other concern will find to his cost that he is in the hands of the dupers. Some of our readers may remember in the early days how Ambrosio, Cines of Rome, Eclair, Film d'Art, Lux, and other well-known makes were duped, resulting in loss of prestige and ostracism to the offenders. These firms are now represented either by their own agents or trustworthy firms who would scorn to dupe, and they are putting their best productions through members of the Sales Co. or M. P. P. Co., and would not by any means trust the element of discord now growing up on false pretenses and promises. Again, no honest exchangeman who values his reputation will associate with this wily combination; they have everything to lose and nothing to gain by such contact.

Exhibitors will also shun the products of these firms whose films are too shady to pass the National Board of Censors. We learn some of the subjects are so blase they are only fit for stag parties, as one man informed us. Exchangemen supplying and exhibitors showing such films ought to be punished, as by exhibiting them they are rousing the city and religious powers in a righteous crusade for their suppression, and in this the good suffer for the bad who are to blame. We hold no brief for either the Sales or the Patents Co. We have primarily the good of cinematography, then the good of our readers and representing them we do not and will not carry the ads of the duper to mislead those who put their trust in us.

RUMORS, AND RUMORS, AND MORE RUMORS

The air of New York is full of them—mostly all hot air; but when it comes to linking such names as those of J. Alexander Leggett and C. Lang Cable, Jr., of the Associated M. P. P. Co. with these nefarious schemes, it is time to call a halt. The A. M. P. P. Co. are not joining or identifying themselves with any association of men who are trying hard to foist a lot of duped film on the market. They stand on their own merits and refuse to acknowledge any combination principally engineered by men who very prominently figure in imposing upon the trade.

AN INCONGRUOUS STATE OF AFFAIRS

Afer long hours of thought, constant writing to people in authority, endeavoring to alleviate the conditions of the alien operators, we thought we had succeeded when we published the letter from the Board of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, but still there is a barrier remaining to be broken down. Men of good ability, qualified in every respect, who have held licenses in the city ever since a license bureau was formed, are now in the position that they have to serve six months apprenticeship before they can get a license. Is there any full legislation anywhere in the civilized world that can beat such a state of affairs as this?

"THE POWER OF DEVOTION," FROM THE YANKEE FILM COMPANY

THE scenario for the above came from the pen of Mr. Isadore Bernstein, who calls himself "the small assistance of Big Bill Steiner," who is president of the company. This film has a great deal of merit—it contains not one moral, but two. Mr. Bernstein has been working on an ideal which has presented itself to him, that of giving to the public a picture which has plenty of human interest, enough sensation to make it taste good, and invariably a moral. This film has all of this. The opening scene is laid in view of the Storm King Mountain—a very beautiful setting. The story runs thus: The heroine of the story has two very ardent admirers, one a young physician and the other a broker. The broker is her choice, whom she marries. This man is hard worked, and as his brain weakens from over fatigue and mental stress, he takes to stimulants, bracing himself to mental efforts, to which the tired brain is unequal. By-and-bye, one day, intoxicated and overwrought, arriving in sight of his own door just in time to see his wife with his rival of other days, whom she has accidentally met on the street, step from an automobile and enter the house, in his abnormal condition the husband is seized with a fit of jealousy, ordering the rival from the house. Becoming insane from a nervous condition aggravated by liquor and a jealous passion, he makes an attack upon his wife, knocking her insensible. He is seized and sent to a sanitarium for recovery from which he escapes while still insane. The wife seeing by the newspaper that a madman has escaped, and consumed by the idea that it may be her husband, starts out to search for him, meeting him on one of the scenes of their courtship, the opening scene of the picture. She calls upon the young physician to aid her. He does so, using his medical skill to bring back the husband's wandering reason, which returns while the wife is seated anxiously watching over him whom she has never ceased to love. The finale shows up well in the husband's gratitude for, and belief in the wife's devotion, and the friendship and good will shown by the rival.

The first moral that stands out in the picture is the uselessness of stimulating to any good purpose an organ of the body so important as the brain, when nature's store of natural stimulative force has been exhausted, and the second, the power of the devotion of a good woman in the adjustment and readjustment of a man's life.

Special mention should be made of the work of Mr. Grant in the part of the husband. The scene in the dining-room where he stealthily seizes from off the buffet the wine bottle and glass, accentuating his already drunken condition, is very finely worked up, as in fact are all his scenes. The film is one to commend itself to producers as ideal in combination, being of interest to the scientifically inclined as well as to sensation lovers.

Another beautiful film to be released by the Yankee in the course of a month is "Inshavogue," a story of Ireland's early fight for liberty.

THE TREND OF THE TIMES

By Margaret I. MacDonald

THE trend of the times is to progress. It is an age of theories worked out, and dreams become realities; of things that seemed a few years ago but flights of fancy—distorted ideas from the brains of inventors gone mad.

Was it only yesterday that stage coaches covered the distance across continent, from ocean to ocean? Since then steam propelled cars have come, and, we might almost say, have gone. The thing that used injudiciously has the power to dispel life in an instant; that used judiciously, adjusting nerves, enriching blood, heating, lighting, propelling us over the ground in horseless carriages, bids fair to entirely displace the steam propelled car. The aeroplane aspires to usurp the place of the ocean liners, messages are flashed upon the air, entrusted to the honor of the atmosphere to be guided to receivers tuned to receive them, several hundred miles away. The medical science goes ahead in fits and starts, and jumps; in fact, all branches of science point toward a fulfilment of the dreams and prophecies of the ancient and semi-ancient seers. And last, but not least, the motion picture is bounding ahead at such a fast and furious pace that one fears lest the train of events along which it is carried should jump the track and lose itself in the ethereal region of the dreamers. Yesterday it was a much-despised form of entertainment sought after only by the rabble: to-day it is our most useful vehicle of education as well as our cheapest form of pleasing entertainment. Is it not true that they are being adopted by the churches as well as schools and colleges? All of these things are incentives to produce educational films. Philanthropists are becoming interested: scientists are becoming interested; in fact, all intelligent and educated people look upon the motion picture as a mighty means to an end.

The advancement and general development of the human race is a responsibility which we all should feel—a responsibility which some of us shirk out of abject laziness, of lack of human interest, and others from lack of intelligence to realize.

The progress of the motion picture stands out not alone in the taking, developing, exhibiting, etc., but also in the manner of men conducting the business. To-day shows us many of the greedy, grasping sort—specimens of the wolf kind—as well as many who are interested for art's sake and for the sake of the betterment and education of the race. To-morrow will show us whole moving picture concerns conducted by philanthropists and educators, and always "the fittest shall survive."

In connection with the educational side of the motion picture, I heard very recently of one of the tropical islands which has been inhabited by savages, and where, since the incoming of a white population, an effort has been made to civilize the natives and persuade them to be clean and to live as we do; not, however, until the advent of the motion picture to the island did the teachings of the white man have any marked effect. These simple natives saw from the pictures how the white man lives in his home and straightway set about to imitate what they saw in the picture. The silent, pantomimic lesson made its impression on the minds of those simple island people.

A great, gigantic thing, with arms far-reaching, and hands full of the fruit of the tree of knowledge is this wonderful invention of moving photography; it progresses and keeps on progressing, and the end is not yet.

Well! Well! WELL! WELL!

And don't think that because there are four wells to this they are empty and there's nothing in this story. But after you finish reading this, you will have to doff your Panama to—but wait!

When Alexander, that doughty warrior of old, conquered the world, he chafed because there was no longer anything to vanquish. If Alexander thought Mars was inhabited in that day, he would, no doubt, invade that planet and subjugate it. Well, here's the point—Rex is the Alexander of the film world.

Rex has gone to Europe. Rex has taken Europe, not by shot and shell, by the grim glory of war, but by popularity. That's a different kind of a battle. Rex opened an office in London. Nothing remarkable in that fact alone, because we expected it sooner or later. It wouldn't surprise us to find that Rex had opened an office in Yokohama, or Pekin, or Calcutta, or any old far-off corner of the earth. No; but Rex has won London in its first peaceful skirmish. The office, located in the business heart of the world's first metropolis, at 5 Compton Street, was the scene of a strange and unique event on its opening day. An exhibition to which were invited the English film showmen, was in progress, and at its culmination nothing was spoken of but the progress of moving pictures in general and Rex in particular. Refreshments were served—but that won't surprise you either, when we tell you that the exhibition lasted from 9 a.m until 11 p.m., and that few of those present ever thought of leaving until the very last picture was thrown upon the screen. Then the verdict was given—a verdict of surprised "Ahs" and "Ohs." The Rex European agents didn't ask for a single order at the time, but of course when several exhibitors voluntarily begged to be given the privilege of buying the film, they were condescendingly permitted to do so. On all sides were heard favorable comment on the excellence of the product, and a tremendous success for Rex abroad was forecasted unanimously.

Rex contemplates the establishment of offices in the principal countries of Europe, and already plans are being made for a very early opening of Paris and Berlin headquarters. Rex, that never forgets anything, and remembers a good deal more than is actually necessary for the producing of pictures, didn't slip up in any way as regards their foreign branches. They are to be looked after by men of standing and repute in the film business, men who have done things and whose names stand for enterprise and achievement.

Rex has not been tempted to turn out two reels a week, great as has been the encouragement for a twin Rex, but they are putting into their weekly masterpiece all the qualities and tenets of perfect pictures. In America, in Europe, in Afghanistan, Rex is King!

TWO WORTHY THANHOUSER RELEASES

"The Cross" and "A Romance of Lonely Island" are two very excellent Thanhouser films about to be released. "The Cross" is most commendable in artistic effect and dramatic situations. The scene where the hero of the story, with knife uplifted to kill in revenge the man who caused him to serve five years in prison, released only in time to see his wife's newly made grave, is lured from the room to the street by the old parish priest—his eyes riveted to the uplifted cross—in time to prevent the crime, is most effective. "A Romance of Lonely Island" is a pretty little story with plenty of the love element and artistic settings.

WHAT SHALL WE GIVE HIM?

THE THANHOUSER TWO-REEL PRODUCTION OF "ROMEO AND JULIET"

This subject is big enough and well known enough to be "billed like a circus" by Independent exhibitors who want to start the fall right and don't mind advertising a good thing when they get it. To help the "live" exhibitor's game, the Thanhouser Company is offering him extra billing matter gratis. It is only requested that he state whether he is already receiving the firm's bulletins—they're glad to list him if he isn't. He should address the Manager's Department, Thanhouser Company, New Rochelle, N. Y.

The first reel of "Romeo and Julict" gives the spectator the complete story of Romeo's romantic courting of the fair Juliet, showing the sequence in the daring secret marriage. The play as a whole treats of two rival noble families of Verona, who for several generations have been bitter foes. The offspring of these families, Juliet, the daughter of the Capulets, and Romeo, son of the Montagues, meet and love, before they know that, on account of the family feud, they can never be united in marriage. Their love is too strong, however, to permit anything to stand in its way, and knowing they can never obtain their parents' consent, they are secretly wed.

Shortly after this, young Romeo is banished from Padua for dueling, and is compelled to bid his young bride farewell. Following his absence, Capulet endeavors to force his daughter, Juliet, to marry a nobleman he has chosen for her.

In her distress Juliet turns to the Friar who secretly married them. This kindly old man agrees to help the lovers. He gives Juliet a sleeping position, which, after she has taken it, will make her seem dead. It is his intention to take the supposedly dead Juliet from her tomb, and reunite her to her banished husband.

He sends a message to Romeo, telling him of the plan, but unfortunately news of Juliet's death reached Romeo before the Friar's message. The distracted youth purchases a vial of poison, and taking it with him to the tomb, where he finds the apparently lifeless body of Juliet, he drains the deadly potion. Juliet revives soon after this and finding on the steps of the tomb the body of her beloved husband, takes her own life. When the Friar arrives upon the scene, intending to free Juliet, and unite the lovers, he finds them already united in death.

THE PARSON AND THE BULLY

We owe to Mr. Charles Simone, better known as "Charlie," who skilfully steers the Nestor publicity campaign, the irrepressible pleasure of having seen some of Nestor's latest and best releases. As we had not looked upon a Nestor picture for some time, we had not the remotest idea of the wonderful improvement made by this house, the oldest in the Independent field, and were more than agreeably astounded; the natural acting the careful attention to even the smallest detail, the perfect staging, the steadiness of film, and the unsurpassable beauty of the amazing photography actually swept us off our feet.

"The End of the Trail" and "Roped and Tied," released respectively August 2d and 9th, are Westerns of exceptional merit, surpassing anything and everything in the Cowboy-Indian line we had ever seen. "The Parson and the Bully" will be released Wednesday, August 30th, and unless we are greatly mistaken, will prove the biggest box-office attraction of the year. This picture is fashioned somewhat along the lines of "The Fighting Parson," also a Nestor, which though released about eighteen months ago, is still in great demand.

"The Parson and the Bully" deals with a traveling Evangelist, his wife, two pretty daughters, his athletic son, also a minister of the Gospel, a Western bully and his associates. The old minister attempts to preach the Word of God in a rough and isolated community; his endeavors are met with disheartening rebuffs and he and his family are badly treated by the bully and his companions. Rather than yield, the old parson sends for his son who promptly arrives on the scene and starts the evangelization of the rough crew. This, however, cannot be accomplished by presenting the other cheek, and the young pastor, in a mighty clever and interesting five-round boxing exhibition, uses his brain and brawn to such good advantage that everybody is evangelized and they all meet the next Sunday morning in holy reverence to break ground for an edifice to God.

To say that "The Parson and the Bully" will have great vogue and will earn money for exchanges and exhibitors alike, is to but it very mildly. It is admirably acted and photographed in Nestor's own inimitable manner. Nestor, keep it up!

THE NIAGARA SLIDE COMPANY

The Niagara Slide Company, of Lockport, N. Y., have an announcement in this week's issue of the "News," and we would advise exhibitors to send to them for their catalog, which will prove of much interest.

"THE POISONED FLUME"

In picture entitled "The Poisoned Flume," described in an issue of Film Facts, the big flume which supplies the water to El Cajon Valley is utilized. This flume is over one hundred miles in length and is fed from Cuyamaca Lake far up in the mountains. All of the cattle in El Cajon Valley receive their water from this flume as it is the only water worthy of mention throughout the entire extent of the valley.

The ingenuity of the picture will be acknowledged by those exhibitors who see it, as the story is so plausible, and the truth of our oft-repeated assertion, that it is unnecessary to exaggerate conditions as they exist in the West at the present time, in order to lend a spirit of interest and thrill to a moving picture, is exemplified in a startling manner in this particular producton. To appreciate this fact it is only necessary to view the film. Then again, as it is unquestionably the best dramatic Western film ever released by the American Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, it will prove to the advantage of the exhibitor—not only to view it himself—but likewise to extend the privilege to his patrons.

The Only Live Wire Page of Moving Picture Comment Published—A Few Fresh Paragraphs That'll "Wise" the Little Film Man to the Big Fellow and the Big Doings in a Few Reading Minutes— —Choice Chatter on the News of Filmdom When it Happens, And Sometimes Before

O THE ACCURATE moving picture press! Just can't get things right! One of its members prints the following story in the current issue and asks me to believe it:

KEITH & PROCTOR'S FILM MAKERS?
A Strong Rumor Says So

According to a seemingly well authenticated report Tom Cochrane, the former manager of the Imp Company and lately connected with the Lubin Film Company, of Philadelphia, has signed a contract with Keith & Proctor as producer for a moving picture enterprise, which is to furnish exclusive service to the houses of the Keith & Proctor circuit.

It is said that a company of competent actors has been engaged and that the new concern will use for the present Lubin's old plant in Philadelphia.

Keith & Proctor as Film Makers

IT READS well. Keith & Proctor for years have been one of the country's leading exhibitors—if not THE leading exhibitor—and certainly had the strength and backing to go into the film-making game and make money at it. But this was all "once on a time." To-day the film-manufacturing market is shut up as tight to new blood as a new penknife that won't open at all. All sensible people in the business recognize this. Your Uncle Filmore recognizes it. And certainly Keith & Proctor recognize it. They'd never have made the profits a certain little litigation matter showed they did, if they weren't folks of sense and balance.

Why, There Ain't No Keith & Proctor at All!

AND THAT LITTLE litigation matter—it makes me conjure up things. Wasn't it about a dissolution of partnership? Wurra-wurra! 'twas! 'twas! Result, no longer is there a firm by name o' Keith & Proctor. They've gone and cut asunder. Keith's enterprises are now Keith's; and Proctor's are Proctor's. It's all a matter of court record. And evidently this particular member of the picture press knew nary a thing about it! What else can you believe?

The Rumor Factory Is Working Overtime

AND THE IDEA of connecting Tom Cochrane's name with so vapory a proposition! Tom isn't associating himself with any lighter-than-air project of this sort. The rumor factory merely used him to fill space. Is no one safe from the sacriligeous touch of the factory hands?

The Two M's Run the Solax

HERBERT BLACHE and his wife are now in balmy France, and many wonder who is running the Solax Company in their absence. Well, to let the secret out: George Magie and Wilbert Melville. Magie is right at the helm of the business department and Melville is steering the production end. They make a bully team, let it be said. M and M—why shouldn't they? A pleasant trip to you, Mr. and Mrs. Blache! With two such loyal servants as the Two M's watching things, you can take your time about getting back to business and can enjoy your vacation to the fullest.

JAMES L. McINTYRE is no longer connected with the Nestor people as general manager. Charley Simone, the pretty little fellow who has been Nestor's press man for many moons and did much to make Messrs. Mutt and Jeff popular, is now combining the work of the business department with that of the publicity, and the union of the two seems to be working out well.

And Now They Lick Patco on Water

BERNSTEIN, of the Yankee Film Company and Rubenstein of the Sales Company pulled a hot trick on the Patents Company at the Cleveland exhibitor's meet when, after the Patent Company threatened to cancel the license of the Hippodrome if Independent pictures were shown the convention attendants there, the pair showed the Anti-Trust reels just the same. How! O, merely by sticking a picture screen on a raft and a projection machine on the excursion boat that took the conventionites on a moonlight sail. They had the raft tied to the excursion boat and carried along with 'em. Then at the proper moment they had the projection machine on the boat shoot Independent pictures down onto the picture screen on the raft, and the packed boat rang with cheers for Plucky Independence.

Those Children of the Patents Company

I AM PARALYZED and peeved at the childish effort of the Patco to "get square" with the Independents for making better pictures. That projection machine suit aimed at exhibitors made me diet to cure my deep disgust. This "kid business" of scaring a man by suing him is just too foolish for words, and I was thoroughly pleased when Secretary Miles showed himself equal to the occasion by transferring the defense of the suits to Sales Company's able attorneys.

The Secret of the Junior Sales Company Is Out

LAST WEEK the Sales Company held their Thursday meeting in the afternoon, which was a good deal of an innovation. You see, previous to this the Powers-That-Be in the Independent field foregathered at No. One-Eleven at about eight-thirty in the evening each meeting-Thursday, and held high confab until early morn. While the Real Things argued inside, out in the lobby the Junior Sales Company held THEIR meeting. Legion were they, but select, at that—Evans, Engel, Adler, Abrahams, Raver—a brainy assembly IF a bossed one. At last Thursday's meeting the really-truly Sales Company ALONE met. Why? 'Cause 'twas daytime, Fool, and the Junior Sales Company had to be at their desks earning their salaries!

Going to the Independents for Material

THE FIRM of Lubin, which brought several players from Independent companies to join its own ranks, has now raided the Independent producing camp in another quarter—the director's one. Just a week ago they grabbed an eminent stage director from a foremost Independent firm and created some dismay there for a time. But on the whole the action is a very satisfactory sign. It means that the Independent product has come to be so essentially good that the men engaged in making it are worth while having in the Trust studios.

What Used To Be

IT USED to be that the Independents went to the Trust studios for "big names"—people whose standing in Trust pictures was high enough to bring prestige to the Independent producer who hired 'em. The story of the two "Biograph girls" is moving picture history. At the time they came over to the Independent camp, the Independent product was so generally poor and unpopular that "big names" for featuring in the advertising were needed to make the pictures "take" with the public. To-day I can say that the Independent film stands successful on the strength of its all-round merit. "Big names" are no longer a main asset. The "girls" I have mentioned, for instance, are no longer Independent players, and still the records show that the Independent manufacturers are doing the banner business of their existence.

Whatever You Do, Join the National

THE NATIONAL Film Distributing Company, which has been "panned" so hard by able writers that I hate to add mine, is now advertising its programme. The ad itself gives the snap away—"ONE American and TWO foreign pictures released each day." As though there were a single exhibitor in the United States crazy enough to risk his investment by foisting "one American and TWO FOREIGN pictures" daily on his patrons! I would advise the National to suspend operations until they gather in some more native brands of film. I see they already have the "Plantation," the "Rose," the "Federal," the "Washington," the "Mohawk," the "Oklahoma," and the "California"!

NEWSY ITEMS FROM EL CAJON VALLEY

We quote herewith from a letter received from Mr. Allan Dwan, the producer in charge of American Western company, in El Cajon Valley.

"My Dear Mr. Kennedy:—

"The Fourth of July is a rigid holiday in this community, so I took advantage of the lay-off and went on a 135-mile auto trip through the back country in search of hidden moving picture treasures. The trip was well worth the effort for I found a variation in scenery hard to equal. Forty miles back there are great stretches of range land flooded with cattle, and a little higher up on the Cuyamaca range I found big pine forests reminiscent of Canada. From the top of one of the Cuyamacas we looked out into the Imperial desert and its mysterious Salten Sea. A sea which in the past few years has sprung up from nowhere, to flood the desert."

Mr. Dwan is a busy man and his remarks are necessarily concise and to the point but, judging from the extract above, the exhibitors who are featuring Flying A Cowboy pictures can look forward to some remarkable scenic effects in our forthcoming productions.

ROYALTY AND "KINEMACOLOR"

On Monday evening, July 24th last, the King's box at the Scala Theater was by royal command reserved for their Majesties, but at a late hour the King, being detained at Buckingham Palace by the grave political crisis, by telephone postponed his visit, and sent His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to represent him. The Prince was greatly impressed by the "Kinemacolor" reproduction of the stirring events of the Coronation, and especially by the scenes of his own Investiture at Carnarvon Castle; and at the fall of the curtain he joined heartily in singing the national anthem. Subsequently His Royal Highness sent for and congratulated Mr. Charles Urban, and discussed with him most interestedly the leading principles of kinematography in natural colors. On the previous Saturday the performance had been witnessed by their Royal Highnesses the Princesses Marie Louise and Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein.

On Wednesday evening at the Scala Theater, in London, King George V, in company with the Prince of Wales, occupied the Royal Box.

This is one of the unique things in our twentieth century civilization, as King George V is the only monarch in the world's history who has ever had the pleasure of witnessing his own coronation, with the actual scenes and events surrounding it, in Kinemacolor.

MOVING PICTURES AND THE CLERGY

By A. L. Barrett

SINCE the introduction of moving pictures a great deal has been said about the narrow-mindedness of the clergy in regard to them, and this body has been criticized and blamed for its wholesale denunciation of picture plays and for the prejudiced views it has taken of the whole industry. More recently, however, a great many of the clergy have altered their opinion and many of them now publicly endorse the amusement, while others use the pictures in their church or Sunday School work. The film manufacturers advertise this conversion as much as possible and columns are devoted to the fact that a clergyman approves of or uses them. Many clergymen all over the country are now either using motion pictures in various ways in their parishes or publicly declaring themselves in favor of them, and the manufacturers are very proud of the victory they have won, but it must be remembered that the picture shows the clergy are now endorsing are very different to the plays shown even so recently as five years ago, for since the establishment of the National Board of Censorship the entire industry has undergone a complete change, and it is but just to bear in mind that the clergy withheld their approval only until the picture plays became worthy of it. No clergyman worthy of the cause he represented could or would have approved the average picture plays given ten years ago, and this united stand against them has been one of the strongest factors in their improvement, but the resultant wholesale purification which they have had, together with the superior type of play now presented, have won thousands over to the ranks of pictureplay admirers. Without this purification, they would never have gained the substantial hold which they now have on the refined and educated classes who now visit the plays in such large numbers. If the clergy had endorsed the types presented ten years ago, they would never have won their way to this position, but the best friends of the industry were very shortly convinced that the clergy only recognized the importance of pure, wholesome plays, and acting on this conviction the picture plays have been continually improved. As the clergy belong to the highest ranks of the educated classes, and being, primarily, teachers, they were very likely among the first to recognize the influence for good or evil that is embodied in moving pictures. In Biblical stories and the books used in Sunday Schools, pictures are a very important element, and the little picture generally to be found on the first page of the Sunday School leaflet always attracts the attention of the children long before they bother about the lesson, and it is around this picture that the teachers build their story. Then by constant reference to it, the lesson for the day is impressed on the minds of the children. Like all other educators, the clergy know full well the influence and value of pictures on the childish mind, and it is for this reason that stereopticons have always been so popular at Sunday School entertainments, but the moving pictures adding the element of life to pictured portrayals will, of course, finally supersede the stereopticon in all church work. The clergy have not been slow to recognize the value of moving pictures, but before publicly endorsing them, have insisted on a better quality of goods being submitted to the public, many of whom are their parishioners and children committed to their charge. It is not the moving picture industry that the clergy have been, and many still are, opposed to, but the individual play that has been presented until quite recently, for as soon as the film manufacturers showed a desire to present plays against which there could be no objection raised, the result was shown by one clergyman after another visiting them, many, of course, in a spirit of criticism, but which is gradually giving way to one of entire approval. The value of this approval lies in the fact that they absolutely refused to give it until they could honestly do so.

That the influence and approval of the clergy was desired by the motion picture industry is very evident from the hostility toward the whole clerical body so long as it was refused, and the self-congratulations and general patting on the back in which the film manufacturers are indulging now that this is every day becoming an increasingly assured fact.

The question as to whether picture plays should be exhibited on Sundays is one on which there are many opinions, but most people will admit that if it is desirable to have a good, clean and wholesome programme on a week day, it is doubly essential that those shown on Sundays should be the very best in every respect that is obtainable. If care was exercised in this particular, and such plays were presented as "Herod and the Newborn King," "The Crusaders," "Elaine," "The Life of Moses," and others of this class, we should not hear so many objections to exhibiting moving pictures on Sundays. They will never lose the favor of the public, so far as being a popular form of amusement is concerned, but this is their least important mission, and if picture plays must be shown on Sundays, there is no need to antagonize the whole of the religious and educational world by exhibiting the worst films on that day. Plays suitable to the day should be presented and the abominable illustrated song could be entirely eliminated.

While these are given, it will be impossible to obtain the unqualified endorsement of the clergy, for some of the songs are very repulsive to the audience, a great many of them leave the building when they are given. The pictures on the screen generally portray a girl of about seventeen years of age, still in short skirts and with her hair hanging down her back. Her companion is a flashily dressed young man wearing a straw hat set well on one side, who makes it his business to serenade her with a love sonnet the like of which could not be found in any classic collection. They are usually depicted strolling through romantic spots, the young man clasping the young girl in the tightest of embraces while they walk, although walking under such circumstances must be rather an awkward exertion. The final picture generally represents this pair of lovers perched, still in a fervent embrace, on the crescent of the moon or some equally unattainable place. (This description represents one of the best types of illustrated song.) The strident tones of a singer? accompany their every action and the song is full of such words as hug, kiss, etc., the singer? punctuating his song by some very audible kisses wafted to an admiring? audience, the chorus generally being shown on the screen and the little children singing it. Would anyone respect the clergy if they gave their sanction to such a spectacle?

There are many good old songs of all nations which are familiar to everyone, and new ones always being published which are far better suited to be sung and illustrated where many of the audience are young people, and frequently only children. There are also plenty of good voices to be found without resorting to the tin-horn variety we hear so frequently, and if some managers succeed in obtaining the services of such persons, why cannot all do the same? There is room for a great deal of improvement in the illustrated song feature, and the sooner this is recognized and the strident tones of these strenuous singers are but memories of a dead past, the happier will be the whole community.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

By L. W. D.

The Development of Color Cinematography

COLOR photography as applied to cinematography is an unfamiliar subject with the masses of picture theater patrons, and to those readers a brief survey of the origin and development of color photography I feel would not be unwelcome. To fix the colors of a camera picture has always been a problem for the solution of which numbers of inventors have labored unceasingly to accomplish since the early days of photography. Like Mother Shipton's theoretical prophecies, which have all the realities excepting the Millenium, reference should be made to the origin of one of the most remarkable deveopments of photographic science. An extraordinary work was published in 1760 under the title of "Tiphantic," being an anagram of the writer's name, in which he divined not only photography as we know it, but also photography in colors. He relates haw he was transported to the palace of " Elementary Genius," the chief of which addressed him as follows: "Thou knowest that the rays of light reflected upon different bodies are pictures, and that it paints their semblance upon all polished surfaces and upon the retina of the eye. Upon water and glass the elementary winds have sought to fix these passing images. They use a substance very viscous, subtle, durable, which promptly dries and by means of which a picture is made in the twinkling of an eye. They cover this substance with a linen cloth and present it to the objects they wish to take; the first effect is that of a mirror wherein one sees the whole adjacent and distant bodies upon which the light can bring the image, that which a glass cannot do, as the linen—by means of its viscous covering—retains the images. The mirror, although rendering the objects faithfully, does not keep them; but the prepared linen not only takes them faithfully, but keeps them. After taking the images they place it in an obscure place, one hour after the covering has dried, then you have a picture more true and precious than art can imitate, and which time cannot efface. They take from this source the most pure in the body of light; the colors that paint them drawn from different materials that never fails or time alter. The precision of the design, the variety of impression the gradations of blend and shading, the perspective, they abandon all to nature itself, which, with this method never gets the lie—traced upon linen are images which improve themselves to the eyes and appeal to all our senses at once. The elementary mind enters afterwards in a few physical details, (firstly) upon the nature of the glutinous body which intercepts and holds the rays; secondly, upon the differences in preparing and mode of employing them; thirdly, upon the play of the light and of drying the body; three problems which I propose to the physicists of our day, and which I abandon to their sagacity."

This was the forecast, quaint yet based upon living realities in the year 1760, to be followed later by the researches and experiments of "Becquiral," "Siebeck" and "Poiterin." The basis upon which their researches emanated consisted of sub-chloride of silver, the properties of which gave them their opportunities, inasmuch that this chemical product possesses the marvelous property of reflecting light similar in composition to that which causes its own formation; and the earliest successful experiment recorded was made by "Becquiral," when he demonstrated that color intensified the illusion of a photograph and which subsequently eclipsed the monochrome copy, whilst Siebeck, a professor of the University of Jena, famous for his discoveries in thermo-electrics sought in 1810 to obtain photographs colored naturally by rays of light by means of the prism; the rays being recorded on a screen conveniently disposed, a lively colored image presenting itself in constant order, a series of tints which melted into each other in forming that which in physics is known as "Spectre." Amongst these infinite number of tints are to be distinguished principally the seven following colors, which enumeration forms an Alexandrian violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange and red. Siebeck let fall upon some chloride of silver spread over some paper when the spectre from the rays was created. Later in 1808 Zenker advanced his theory for producing colors by the aid of stationary light waves, afterwards verified by Prof. Lippman in 1891, whose clear demonstration created great enthusiasm throughout the scientific world, the results of which were greatly in advance of all former attempts; but numerous difficulties presented themselves which prevented his methods being adopted for practical use.

Upon the principles and development of "Kinemacolor"—the last word in color photography—I cannot dwell in this article; suffice it to say that with regard to color photography anyhow—"there is nothing new under the sun."

The Picture Theater and Public Morals

"Education is the fairest thing that the best of men can ever have," said Plato. "Pouvouir sans savior est fort dangereux," said an eminent French moralist. "Of all treasures, knowledge is the most precious, for it can neither be stolen, given away nor consumed," said the Hitopadesia. True it is that the ignorant life must be a comparatively dull, uneventful one. Make no apology for quoting these master men who taught fact, namely, that to be successful in life, education was needed. Everywhere we see new schools being built, and the tremendously important side issue of education—the picture theater, and shoulder to shoulder, stand the school and the picture theater as factors in the people's education. At the occasion of an opening of a new cinera on "the other side" recently a reverend gentleman said he was glad to perform the ceremony as he felt that he was supplying the workingman with a good education for the price of a couple of pints of beer! "There was," he continued, "grave need for something to be done to enable the workingman to spend his time properly. The spending of time properly means profitably and profitably means beneficially." Again, the picture theater creates a moral atmosphere. I feel that on this point I shall stimulate the animosity of some of my patient readers who view this question contrary to myself. But nevertheless my convictions lead me to say that many a man who is a frequenter of a different atmosphere to that of a picture theater, or, to be more explicit still, the man who loses his moral power, and becomes an habitue of questionable entertainments—of him, it can be said that his lack of knowledge brings him back to the man-brute of the mediaeval ages.

The mind of the child retains many of the little incidents portrayed on the screen, that retentiveness in education, and little by little the small mind begins to broaden, and the outlook upon life is more seriously developed. The exhibitor holds no light responsibility in this connection, and this article would be useless if I did not make a special appeal to all those in authority to produce the best possible films.

It has been said that the picture theater is only for children—we, however, know otherwise. Securing the best possible films to reproduce before your patrons is no reflection upon the manager, as one of those "fanatical moralists," who would do well to bear in mind the motto of the Garter.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE

A Story of Life in a Country Village in Which Superstition Is the Theme

HOW a miserly old villain is unmasked while playing upon the superstition of residents of a country hamlet makes a story of unusual interest that will soon be released by the Imp Company. The types have been admirably selected to portray this drama with fidelity to settings nd acting, and it is a tale that is so different from the ordinary picture play that it will be welcomed for its freshness. A mechanic, who has slaved for years to lay up a little hoard against approaching old age is in the grasp of a miserly old real estate dealer who has a mortgage on a house belonging to him, which is for rent. The unprincipled old money grabber conceives an idea of making the house valueless as a rental property by spreading the report among the simple minded folk that it is haunted. Strange sights are seen about the place and hideous noises are heard in the still hours of the night. The gossips find food for reflection and the villagers are frightened, giving the house a wide berth. A young man comes to the hamlet in the capacity of telegraph operator and railroad agent. He is from the city and intelligent. He sees the daughter of the persecuted mechanic and loves her. He also hears the weird stories of the haunted house. Doing a little investigating, he is convinced that some evil-minded person is responsible for the strange demonstration at the house. Following the old miser to the deserted house, he enters and it is all made clear. He resolves to clear up the mystery and unmasks the old money-grabber while he is on the roof, garbed in a sheet, terrifying the gaping crowd below. He shows up the miser as the masquerader and eventually marries the girl, being rewarded by the thanks of the mechanic and voted a hero by the residents of the town. It is an interesting story, faithfully told.

CASTLES IN THE AIR

HAVE MANY

UPS AND DOWNS

But "CASTLES IN THE AIR" a Rex wonder-film, RELEASED THURSDAY,

August 24th, will bring your box receipts UP and your hand DOWN, down over your heart, swearing allegiance to REX. It's a dream of a picture, showing the blessful dream of Bedelia, a maid, who suddenly becomes transformed to mistress of the house, goes automobiling, yachting, and is courted by a lord—Lord, what a dream! Castles in the air! Who doesn't build them? Who at one time or other isn't the architect of some fairy, airy castle among the clouds? But ah! the awakening!

Bedelia wakes up; your audience wakes up—they'll think they were dreaming themselves; and you wake up to the fact that

REX IS THERE!

"CASTLES IN THE AIR" will drive away all care!

A TRIUMPH IN IMP PRODUCTION.

See Our Front Cover Illustration

"Duty" is the title of a picture recently produced by the Imp Company which is a triumph in scenic effects and intensity of acting. It will be one of the notable films of the year, both as a strong story and as a finished production in the way of stage effects and natural scenery. It is a story of a lighthouse keeper and his family, who live in the lighthouse off shore, an isolated little community, whose neighbors are passing ships with the booming of the ocean against the stone work, the only thing to break the monotony. The mother, who has a small child, is ill, and the keeper, as is his usual custom, goes to light the lamps for the night. He finds, to his consternation, that the mechanism that revolves the lights, has been disabled and that the tower must be manipulated by hand. Summoning his boy he bids him keep the lights revolving while he goes to the mainland to bring repairs. The boy takes up the task and the father shoves off in the dory. The boy works faithfully but the task is too great for his strength and he falls exhausted. The mother, having an intuition that all is not right, arises from her bed, looks out and discovers that the lights are not revolving. She starts up in terror as the situation dawns upon her. She fears for the ships which are liable to be dashed to pieces on the treacherous shoals. Summoning her strength she crawls to the dome of the lighthouse and there finds her boy prostrate before the light. With superhuman strength and will she takes up the task and staggers as she turns the light tower. In the meantime, the husband has secured the needed repairs and is rowing to the light. His dory strikes a rock and is wrecked and he is forced to swim for it. He reaches the lighthouse in an exhausted condition, crawls up the stones and swoons from his exertions. Recovering he enters the living room to find his wife absent with the baby sleeping in the cradle. Staggering up the stairway he finds his wife and child, both insensible beside the light, she having fallen from exhaustion. He revives them both and bears the sick woman down stairs in his arms. Later the captain of a vessel that was saved from destruction by the constant burning of the light which was turned by the woman, visits the lighthouse and offers the keeper a medal, having learned of the heroic conduct of the family. The keeper tells the sailor the credit, if any, belongs to the wife and the captain presents her with the token of reward.

The scenes on the sea and those in the lighthouse are clear in photography and the interior views are faithful and realistic. It is one of the strongest stories of the sort ever produced by any company.

THE CHAMPION FILM CO. AND SIDNEY DREW

Several years ago Sidney Drew was the greatest comedian on the American stage, and an actor of great renown. He placed before the public some of the heaviest dramas with beautiful staging and handsome settings. His plays were so massive that they outgrew the vaudeville stage.

Amongst his many productions was one entitled "The Redmen." This play still lingers in the minds of thousands and thousands of theatre-goers both in America and Europe, for it had a most unusual plot and story. The setting, as is gathered from the title, was laid in the West. This is one of the many reasons which made this acceptable to the Champion Film Company.

Mr. Sidney Drew finally thought of his subject as worthy of being filmed. He placed the project before the Champion Film Company and they quickly grasped the opportunity. The play has already been filmed. Needless to say, it is the most unique Western subject. The Champion has purchased the sole rights to the producing of "The Redmen" from Mr. Sidney Drew. The film, however, is entitled "The Red Devils" because of its deeper significance than the original title.

Mark Dintenfass has spent a large amount of money on this production, and has displayed remarkable judgment in securing this remarkable drama. It is a big thing and there are a multitude of Indians, horsemen and Western characters employed. "The Red Devils" will be released on September 13, 1911.

THE "FLYING A" PLAYERS IN FRONT OF THEIR BUNGALOW IN EL CAJON VALLEY, SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

The intelligent looking coterie of moving picture artists included in the Western Stock Company of the American Company, and pictured above, we are informed are the happiest and most enthusiastic aggregation of moving picture people in the West. The contented facial expression of the artists in the picture, reproduced above, confirms this assertion.

The American Company is to be congratulated on the worth of their Western Company and it is small wonder that the Flying A brand of Western pictures is attaining such popularity among the exhibitors.

COMEDIES

Managers say they can't get enough good comedies. And this assertion may be true. But perhaps a definition of comedy as these managers understand it would be helpful. There are comedies and comedies. The old slap stick, the chase, the type represented by Foolshead and Max are others, and then there is the comedy drama. If the type represented by Foolshead is what a manager means, he has no better embodiment. Foolshead is popular everywhere, in city or country alike. And yet, when the pictures in which he appears are analyzed they are based upon nothing. Most of his capers are posed. Clearly no one would ever do the fool things Foolshead does in every picture. But he is a favorite and his comedies are applauded almost everywhere.

Max, Pathe's comedian, is another who does things that are not only funny, they are both unreasonable and foolish. No one would do the things he does. For example, who would wear tight shoes to see his girl, or who would undertake to navigate all day on roller skates? Max does, and the pictures are accounted funny.

Then comes the slap stick comedy in which there is a deal of smashing of furniture and the destruction of much other property. But they are accounted funny by most audiences, and are wanted by managers.

The chase was more popular once than it is now. The chase was hurt by making it too long. The audience tired of it. Hence its somewhat questionable position as regards popularity.

The chase is funny, but it is best to make it short. Too long runs are apt to degenerate into pointless runs. A short, sharp and snappy chase is a very good bit of comedy work. It deserves all the applause it usually gets. But the danger lies in stretching one too far.

The comedy dramas are not so numerous, but they are increasing in number and improving. Some of the leading firms, like Edison, Powers, the Vitagraph and others are making these dramas features of their releases. The effect is beneficial and gradually audiences are being educated up to the higher and more enjoyable forms of humor as expressed in the motion picture.

There should be sufficient comedies now to satisfy the manager who wants them to brighten up his program. It wouldn't be quite possible to make a full program of comedies, but two could be included to advantage. Often two short ones are provided on one reel, and generally when this is the case they are both good.

Comedies are wanted. They form essential portions of the programs in all theaters and probably are more popular than the more serious pictures. But even though this is true, care should be exercised in selections. It is better not to undertake to offer too mnay. The danger is that you will have to resort to one or more that are weak, or seem to have no point. Such comedies are released. Managers know it, and audiences know it. But the recent improvement has made such dangers less marked and there is little necessity of accepting comedy in these days which is not up to the required standard.

The comedy is the spice of the pictures on the screen. Hence, the spice should be made as lively and interesting as possible. It should not be permitted to degenerate. Meanwhile, scenario writers should heed the demand, and turn out better ones than are now produced. This is possible, and will be done with the increased demand for good comedies.

THE ECLAIR FILM COMPANY

And Its New American Plant

THE NEW PLANT OF THE ECLAIR FILM CO. AND ITS PROPOSED WORK

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

THE first American plant of the Eclair Film Company is nearing completion at Fort Lee, N. J., and is possibly the most complete plant of its kind in existence in America, the plan being carefully and scientifically worked out.

It was my pleasure to be allowed a glimpse into the still unfinished compartments of the plant, each of which works in direct co-operation with the other. Starting at one side of the building, room follows room in regular order of usage, from the developing room into the drying room, from the drying room into the department for clipping and cementing together of scenes, etc.

In connection with the Eclair plant is a repairing room where there will be installed some $3,000 worth of American machinery. There will be machinery for all kinds of repair work, even to the making of different portions of the machinery in use in connection with the plant which may be broken or worn out. Also a stock of raw material will be kept in store for that purpose. A mechanic has been brought over from France for the special purpose of keeping all machinery in repair.

It may sound strange at first hearing that the Eclair Company will employ no one on their perforating, printing, or, in fact, any other of their machines, who has any knowledge whatever of the mechanism of the machine which he is working. However, there is a reason for this—the man who knows nothing of the mechanism of his machine is not as liable to "tinker" with it if anything goes wrong as one who does. It is so arranged that he has absolutely no excuse for so doing, a push button being placed directly at the side of each machine, so that the mechanic can be called at a moment's notice.

Altogether, as I understand it, the work of the Eclair Company will be conducted in a most systematic way. The original Eclair Company of which this is but a branch, has its plant of much larger dimensions in Paris, France, where is also their machine shop, where all their machines, cameras, perforating, projecting, printing machines, etc, are made. This assures a perfection and similarity of register in their machines, and a steadiness of photograph which is not arrived at when machines are constructed in a diversity of places.

A little apart from the main plant is the studio of the company now in course of erection, and which is expected to arive at completion in two to three weeks, according to contract. This studio will be built of stone, as is the plant, and will be equipped with no less than four stages, so that work can be carried on continuously—when one set is finished with the other is ready. The object in view in the planning of the whole concern seems to have been the saving of time, which, in the rapid age in which we live, means a saving of money, and a saving of money with the artistic and dramatic portion of the work well looked after means success for the company.

The stock company of the Eclair has already been secured from among some of the finest artists in the country—actors and actresses of wide and varied experience in both comedy and dramatic work. An excellent choice of dramatic director has been made in Mr. McGill. Mr. McGill is a man of wide experience as an actor and director, having been fifteen years in the latter business. He is not only magnetic and affable in personality, but is artistic to a fault, and has an eye for the smallest defect in detail. With Mr. McGill at the head of the dramatic end of the business some fine productions can be expected.

It is a deplorable fact that so few of our dramatic directors in connection with the moving picture business pay so little attention to detail and artistic effect; many of the pictures which might otherwise be beautiful in effect are too often spoiled in the preparation by neglect of attention to the above-named requisites of a pleasing picture.

On Monday, August 21st. the first work of the Eclair Stock Company in America will be commenced, when exterior scenes will be taken, awaiting the completion of the studio for the taking of interior scenes.

The first release of the Eclair Company will be a film entitled "Home, Sweet Home." The story runs thus: A young man, a son of wealthy parents, leaves home to go to the city; at the same time a young girl whose mother, tho' not in easy financial circumstances, has succeeded in keeping the fact from her daughter, becoming tired of home and discontented with what her mother is able to do for her, also leaves the parental roof to seek her fortune in the city. Through force of circumstances they are drawn downward, but not to the point of dishonor. Accidentally, they meet in the park, both falling asleep on the same bench. On awakening they make friends; through the influence of the girl the young man is uplifted; they rise together, and having arisen and placed themselves in circumstances beyond reproach, they return to their homes. The finale shows the institution of another home—the home of the young couple who have fallen in love and married, the home which is the connecting link between the two families.

In this film will be introduced a number of novelties, including the famous "Breadline," and night scenes in the parks.

A great deal of dramatic work as well as comedy work will be done by the Eclair, and pictures of a very high class order will be released by them in the near future. "Home, Sweet Home," will be released in the early part of September.

The Eclair Co., which has been in existence for the past six years in Paris, France, has for the advisory head of its American branch Mr. Brulatour, who is also the president of the Sales Co., Mr. Harry R. Raver as business manager, and Mr. E. Offeman as general manager, in which capacity he has served in America for the past eighteen months.

The plant of the Eclair Co. is situated in one of the most beautiful and woody spots of New Jersey. The situation must necessarily afford, with the woods, and hills, and rocks, and the beautiful Hudson nearby, ample material which may be utilized in the production of exteriors of different types.

We wish the Eclair Co. of America success in their work, for which such careful and thorough preparation has been made. Each day shows some improvement in the making and in the construction of the moving picture. Proper equipment and artistic stage management are requisites which the Eclair Co. have acquired.

THE OFFICIAL GROU

C. M. CHRISTENSON, SECRETARY

THE MOVING PICTURE LEAG CHRISTENSON (

ON August 1, 2 and 3, 1911, there met in Cleveland, Ohio, a convention of the moving picture exhibitors of the United States and Canada. There were present at this convention 300 members, representing 2,200 exhibitors, and the association was formed hereafter to be known as "The Moving Picture League of America," to be chartered under the laws of the State of Ohio.

The officers elected by the Association are as follows: President, M. A. Neff, Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, Ohio; secretary, C. M. Christenson, 703 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio; treasurer, I. J. Rieder, Temple Theater, Jackson, Mich. Any communication, regarding business connected with this Association, may be addressed to the secretary at the above named address.

Memberships are open to every bona fide exhibitor in the United States or Canada, providing said exhibitor is not connected, in any way, with the manufacturing of films or film exchanges. This Association is for exhibitors only. Let there be no misunderstanding as to membership. In any state where there are five or more members comprising a State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors, the Association may join The Moving Picture League of America. In states where there is no organization, an individual wishing to become a member of The Moving Picture League of America may make application to the State Association in an adjoining state. The initial membership fee of a state organization to The Moving Picture League of America is ten dollars, thereafter a per capita tax of twenty-five cents per year. Let it be understood that The Moving Picture League of America recognizes only one Association in each state. If there are two, or more, so-called state organizations, they must become one before they can be affiliated with the National Association.

T CLEVELAND, OHIO

E OF AMERICA—SECRETARY TLINES POLICY

Every exhibitor interested in the betterment of his business and of the conditions affecting same, should immediately become a member of his State Association, and urge its union with The Moving Picture League of America without delay.

On the second Tuesday of August, 1912, at Chicago, Illinois, will be held the second annual convention of The Moving Picture League of America, and we expect the largest attendance of any convention ever held in that city. We also expect this organization, at that time, to be the most powerful and far-reaching in its scope, and in its particular field of endeavor, of any association hitherto known.

The purposes of this organization are self-protection, to raise the standard of motion picture films, to secure recognition on the National Censor Board, the regulation of prices for film service, to prevent breaches of contract on the part of film exchanges, to regulate insurance rates, to secure protection against adverse legislation, to regulate the rental of films to large playhouses during their idle seasons, to adjust difficulties with labor, and the adjustment of many other minor matters of importance to the exhibitor, individually and collectively.

We demand recognition from every branch of the moving picture industry throughout the world. Every local organization having any grievance must state such grievance in concise terms, furnish proof thereof, and then forward same to the state organization, and the state organization will forward it to The Moving Picture League of America for adjustment. This Association is founded on business principles alone, and the officers have pledged their best endeavors to secure the accomplishment of long-needed reforms in the moving picture business.

THE Atlanta City Council some months ago decreed that women attending theaters must, after six o'clock, remove their hats. Because the proprietor of a picture show refused to eject two offenders he was fined $10 and costs. The case was begun and pushed to a final decision by Councilman Johnson, the father of the ordinance, who witnessed the violation. The exhibitor contested the constitutionality of the law. The Court of Appeals says it is all right. Every man in Atlanta doubtless will say the Court of Appeals is all right. But why wait until six o'clock to compel a petticoated hog to be ordinarily considerate?

There have been many laughs among those acquainted with the ways of the management of Ocean Grove in putting a ban on those things which nearly every human being desires to do. Ocean Grove is a seaside reservation in New Jersey which is controlled by churchmen of the spirit of Plymouth, 1620. One law of the little community is that not a wheel shall turn on Sunday—someone has said this even applies to baby vehicles. Here comes a story which is interesting, if true. The chief ground for doubting its accuracy is that it indicates the existence of a picture show in the place. To the best of this writer's knowledge, there was none two or three summers ago.

However, this is a story of a new kind of censorship, which is said to rest in the person of the machine operator. Read this:

"He goes into executive session when the reels arrive and looks them over in secret. If there is anything in the subject, such as a man kissing a woman who appears to be other than his wedded wife, or the picture of a man draping himself on a public bar and tilting liquor into his system, the operator makes note thereof, and when he comes to the public exhibition he goes on grinding the crank, but reaches forward with his free hand and covers the lens until the objectionable scene is past."

Surely no job for a one-armed man.

Out in Appleton, Wis., according to the Milwaukee Journal, there is being built a six-ton American cheese. The Federal Government has taken so much interest in the undertaking that it has contracted for photographs depicting the making of the cheese, from cattle to flat car, which will be shown in moving picture houses. Twelve thousand pounds of cheese should be a moving sight. Would it be described as an inanimate or an animate object?

Announcement has been made that the National Oral Hygienic Association has been organized to institute a campaign for educating the public in the proper care of the teeth. Moving pictures are to be the chief medium.

"A Mother and Sons in 1776" came to grief in Toronto. One of the newspapers of the town wailed very loudly about the portrayal of the British as cowardly and brutal, and shed tears at the replacing in the final scene of the Union Jack with the Stars and Stripes. The authorities took charge of the film.

The incident uncovers a situation which will have repetition on this side of the border when some of the States have their private censorship. There is a new board of censors in the northern province and the members are now at work. They have discovered that there are at large in their jurisdiction something like 4,000 films. As the inspection will naturally be limited to perhaps twenty a day, and taking into consideration the fact that on this side of the border alone the independent and licensed manufacturers are turning out eleven reels every working day, it is quite easy to see that the board will gain in that 4,000 films just nine each day. It will take the board a year and a half to catch up on the American films alone. This estimate takes no account of the many English and continental manufacturers not included in the two American groups.

Some of the agitators for more censorship boards are going up against a game, the stiffness of which they do not fully realize.

The Rev. Dr. Luther Edwards, of the Grand Junction (Col.) Presbyterian Church, has been authorized by the trustees to purchase a projector and secure necessary films. Educational and religious pictures will be shown in the church at all times on Sunday when there is no service on. In order to hasten Sunday closing of the regular shows—and thereby facilitate the approach of the millennium—no admission will be charged. As to whether the contribution basket will be hidden the story sayeth not. Nevertheless the experiment ought to make good healthy competition. If the church can show the exhibitor a thing or two the public will be the gainer.

The Baltimore News has been conducting a prize essay contest on the eternal moving picture question—"What class of pictures do you like best, and why?" The winner was Miss Augusta Hament. In an interview Miss Hament was asked: "In what kind of pictures are you interested?" Her reply expresses the sentiment of many a picture show attendant:

"Mostly in the educational kind. Pictures which show life, industries and customs of people in foreign lands. They are so much more interesting and instructive than books and make a far deeper impression upon the mind. I also enjoy moving pictures of great events."

The poultry industry of Petaluma, Cal., is to be photographed. In the vicinity of Petaluma there are a million and a half laying hens. The picture will show 16,000 chicks in one ordinary brooding house. Another scene will be of 12,000 white Leghorn hens chasing a farm wagon carrying feed.

The Detroit News says that for weeks past there have been no complaints made at police headquarters regarding picture shows, which the News says is a state of affairs unprecedented in the history of the department. In Detroit one policeman is assigned to visit all the shows and to report on conditions. The scheme seems to work well.

Mrs. Elmer E. Bates, head of the Cleveland Association for the Deaf, favors the use of motion pictures for teaching lip reading. "It would be expensive, that's the only objection," she said. "Schools for the deaf teach by the aid of other pictures, charts, and mirrors. More practical than any of these, I believe, would be the motion picture, with the actors clearly enunciating all words."

The other evening the writer was in a picture theater during a thunderstorm. Three times did the lights in the theater and in the projector fail entirely, leaving the hall in absolute darkness. The periods ranged from a dozen seconds to half a minute. One hysterical person in the three hundred present might have precipitated a panic. A couple of low-turned gas jets, accessible to ushers, would have relieved the tension and assured sanity and consequently safety to all.

The New York "Times" on Monday made the following editorial announcement, under the caption "Records for Posterity":

"The destruction of invaluable documents in the fire that devastated the Capitol at Albany and its great library may prove ultimately a gain, not a loss, if it has stimulated an abiding interest in the safeguarding of the records of the past. It is not in the multiplication of repositories of stone and steel in the neighborhood of historic places that this gain may be chiefly effected. We have received from Mr. Alexander Konta a letter announcing the forming of the first municipal Modern Historic Records Association in this city, which is to devote itself not only to the cause of erecting fireproof buildings; it would greatly amplify by modern methods the facilities for giving to posterity an accurate picture of contemporary life.

"Since the goose-quill was discarded as an 'art preservative,' for the linotype and print, snce portraiture in oils, pastels, and black and white was reinforced by the photograph and the films of motion pictures, and the phonograph made it possible for succeeding generations to hear long-silenced voices of the world's artists and leaders, no organized effort has been made to employ these splendid facilities for the transmission to the future of the very form and pressure of the time. It is a worthy enterprise. If successful, its incorporators, headed by men like Dr. George F. Kunz, Melville E. Stone, Robert C. Ogden, General Hubbard, Herbert L. Bridgman, John G. Agar and Mr. Konta, will be long remembered."

The formation of this association marks the beginning of a movement, the importance of which the people of to-day cannot fully realize. Coming generations will.

Probably there is no man in the country who will more heartily wish success to this splendid enterprise than our good friend Saunders.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., Aug. 16.—With the thermomenter registering 105 in the shade the past few days, the "Man in the Baths" claims that he has gone "crazy with the heat," so has commissioned me to provide the weekly review for him.

The most important event of the week in the local moving picture field was the changing of the two Independent houses, the Photo Play and the Scenic, from pictures of the Sales company to Trust product. Some weeks ago these houses were running Trust pictures, but when "The Fall of Troy" was released they saw an opportunity to book a real feature, and in spite of warnings from Broadway, they ran that reel. It wasn't long until an investigation was made and the two houses lost their license. They took Independent pictures and exchanged programs. The Photo Play is situated in the heart of the business district and the Scenic is located on upper Central avenue. The Photo Play would run three reels one day and send them to the Scenic the next, and the Scenic would send to the Photo Play the reels that it used the day before. The houses, being widely separated, business was not impaired very much by the repetition of pictures.

It's different, however, when both houses are using Trust pictures, for the reason that every other theater in the city is also booking the same product and the "repeaters" are a common occurrence. In fact, so common is this situation that the public is educated to it. Take, for instance, the number of reels that are shown in this city during the week. There is the Lyric, which uses four, two for each half. The Lyceum changes every day, three reels to a show, or eighteen in the week. The Scenic also uses eighteen, and so does the Photo Play, as well as the Princess. Count 'em and you find that there are seventy-six reels of motion pictures shown here in one week. You don't find the Trust releasing that many a week, do you? The Photo Play and the Scenic, since starting on the Patent Company's output, have, with one or two exceptions, shown reels that either the Lyceum, Lyric or Princess have used before, especially the Lyric, which house, I understand, is making an effort to get the earliest releases possible, and succeeding, too.

There is at present a real live Independent agent in the city and it would not surprise me to see the two houses in question return to the Independent output, for how they can make money by running pictures that the other houses have shown is beyond me. Their business was immense when they were showing the Independent product, the reels of Thanhouser and the Western American and Bison companies being exceptionally fine, but they claim they desired to change.

Frank Head, manager of the Princess and the Airdome, has returned from a very pleasant business trip and vacation to Chicago, New York, Atlantic City and Asbury Park. While away he practically completed arrangements for the booking of the Auditorium, in which he is also interested, and the vaudeville for the Princess. Mr. Head was "knocked a twister," he states, by the great amount of business that the picture houses in Chicago and New York are doing. He says that is especially true in Chicago, where, for hours at a time, one can find the people lined up waiting to get in to see the pictures. Mr. Head is also of the opinion that the pictures have done considerable damage where profit is concerned to the bigger dramatic productions, and that one-night stands will no doubt enjoy a good season. In fact, he expects to see a host of "one-nighters" out this season, for the larger cities, he thinks, will not stand for the long runs.

The Princess will be booked by the Western Vaudeville Association and he has arranged for the appearance here of some exceptionally clever acts. The Auditorium will get several of the season's big successes, and among the number is mentioned "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford," which, he says, will be seen at the Auditorium. The season at this house will open September 9th, when the "Smart Set," the well-known negro show, will make its bow for annual public patronage. The Airdome, Mr. Heal announces, will remain open until October 9th. This summer theater is enjoying the best season in its history. During the present week the place was packed to the doors every night and when "St. Elmo" was played it was necessary to go outside and borrow chairs and benches in order to accommodate the crowd. Over 300 persons were turned away from the production of Augusta Evans Wilson's masterpiece, which, even though it has been played here many, many times before, is still one of the greatest drawing cards.

If ever a person was surprised, it was "yours truly," when, on entering one of the theaters the past week, I beheld the little Melies girl, Miss Storie, I think her name is, with Vitagraph. Previous to that picture I saw a Melies reel, but she was not playing the usual dashing Western part, and I wondered at the time where she had gone to. But a few minutes later she turned up serenely with Vitagraph. I am glad to see her improving, for she is without doubt one of the cleverest and most winsome leading ladies before the camera. It is now up to Vitagraph to provide her with excellent material, and, we think out here that nothing is too good for this little artiste. Good luck, girlie.

Melies gave us a very good picture in "The Kiss of Mary Jane," and that was the last one in which Miss Storie, I think, came here. I have seen great riding but never anything like that picture. Biograph, however, sent us the most interesting pictures. Their "Country Cupid" was excellent and the "Romany Romance" great. The acting of the children in the former reel, especially that of the little youngster, had the audience in continual laughter. The "Romany" reel was marked by some very clever acting. Edison also scored heavily with "The Younger Brother," and Essanay gave us two good ones in the "Rosary" and the "Two Fugitives." Anderson is doing excellent work in the Western output. Kalem, we enjoyed your reel, "Jaurez After the Battle," which wasn't so very, very far away from here at that, and also "Making Mother Over," which caused much laughter. "The New Officer," by Lubin, was good for all manner of hearty laughter, and "That City Feller," by Selig, contained enough thrills to keep us all interested. "She Came, She Saw, She Conquered" was rather a good picture, true to life, of a country school, and Vitagraph deserves praise for the same.

This is the last week that I had an opportunity of looking at Independent pictures, for the reason, as stated before, that the two houses using same have changed to Trust product, but Bison sent us a very good reel in "Silver Wing's Dream," which, by the way, was a return date. Ambrosio offering, "If One Could See into the Future," was rather Ibsenian in character. It was excellent, but it made us shiver. American also gave us a good reel in "The Cattle Rustler's End," and their pictures are always enjoyed. "The Burglar and the Girl," by Great Northern, was also enjoyed. "The Bi-Centennial Celebration at Mobile, Ala.," was so decidedly Southern that it was received with open arms, for which, ye Imps, accept thanks, and "Mutt and Jeff at the Ball Game" contained its usual good humor. Thanhouser in its reel, "Back to Nature," filled out a week of good pictures and equally good business.

Moving Picture Shows and the Medicos Again

Berkeley, California, Aug. 3, 1911.

Dear Saunders—Read the enclosed clipping, and my answer to it. This is the sort of thing that makes one glad one is not a medico. If you think it will do any good, print it in the "News," or such portion of it as you may have space for Single-handed, one cannot do much, but wherever professional ignorance flaunts itself before a too-credulous public so openly, I am going after it in the interest of the greatest scientific achievement of the age.

"KINETOSCOPIC EYE," LATEST

Berkeley Child's Too Frequent Trips to Nickelodions Results Strangely

Science Has New Malady to Combat Through Flickering of Picture Films

BERKELEY, Aug. 2.—Medical science has a new malady to combat. The "kinetoscope eye," the most recent affliction to engage the attention of optical experts, has appeared in Berkeley in the case of a four-year-old girl, who is under treatment by Dr. J. W. Stitt for nervousness, due to excessive visits to moving picture shows.

This latest malady is to the optic nerve what chorea or St. Vitus dance is to the muscular system, causing the involuntary twitchings that give the eye the appearance of a camera lens with a perpetually moving shutter.

Laid to Pictures

"After an ophthalmoscopic examination," said Dr. Stitt, "I found that the retina of each eye was seriously affected. Upon inquiry as to what might have produced this condition I learned that the child had been a constant visitor to various moving picture entertainments.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the flickering of the pictures is responsible for the affliction. The action would cause and has caused a rapid dilation and contraction of the pupil.

"Unquestionably many cases of eye trouble are due to this cause.

"I fear that if the child had persisted in attending moving picture show performances she would have had paralysis of the optic nerve."

Dr. Stitt declared that the affliction is most readily caused through unsteady, flickering pictures, and said that they are a menace to weak eyes. Clear, steady pictures, he said, are not so harmful.

Berkeley, August 3, 1911.

Editor, Oakland Enquirer:

Dear Sir—In yesterday's issue of the Enquirer appears a front page article under the caption, "Kinetoscopic Eye."

I am writing to correct, or at least modify or amplify, the statements attributed to Dr. Stitt.

In the realm of ophthalmic science the doctor is probably an expert, and when an unusual condition of the retina is met with in a patient, it is but natural to look for a cause. I have no interest in any moving picture show, but I am ready to take issue with Dr. Stitt that his opinion on the cause of the condition he found in the patient's eye will be difficult to prove.

It is easy to blame the moving picture shows for any and every new real or fancied weakness of the eye, but when the doctor speaks of the rapid dilation and contraction of the pupil being due to unsteady and flickering pictures, and even goes farther to show how such pictures are caused to be unsteady and flickering, it is difficult to follow him.

If the "dilation and contraction of the pupil" means the opening and closing of the iris, Dr. Stitt is incorrect in his deduction, for the interruptions of the moving picture shutter are never less than thirty-two, and often forty-eight, per second, and at that speed even the retina is too slow to separate the impressions, for there really IS such a thing as persistence of vision.

A flickering picture is seldom seen now-a-days, and an unsteady picture, due to an entirely different cause, almost as rare.

It is useless to take issue with the moving picture evil, because it is just entering upon its second and widest field; within a very short time the cinematograph will be a definite factor in education the world over.

No, Mr. Editor, the doctors must look elsewhere for the cause of this latest disease.

For instance, why not blame the railroads, for what is more weakening to children's eyes than looking out of the window of a rapidly moving train, where there are no "shutters," and yet where unsteadiness prevails.

This letter is but a mild suggestion to the doctors, that the practice of medicine and the production and projection of moving pictures are two very different things. Medication is at best hedged about by uncertainties, but the science of motography is as exact as the mathematics, and has graduates of both the "opathies" enrolled in its ranks.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington, D. C.

THE Capital City has had the opportunity of witnessing the Kinemacolor pictures of the Coronation of King George of England. This is certainly the triumph of photographic and motion art and it has filled the public with wonder. That color plates have been used in photography in a limited way for a short while is well known, but to put this in motion picture form and present such a performance to the public at prices varying from 25 to 50 cents, places this new art on a commercial basis. So pleased and charmed have the people been with these views that black and white picture shows present some disappointment now. It is possible that the patrons of cinematography will in the near future demand colored photoplays and it is quite possible that they will get what they want. The presentation of these views were given the dignity of one of our first-class drama theaters, The Belasco, and held that stage for a week with two performances daily of a couple of hours each. By giving the Coronation in original colors, the gorgeousness of the festivities were for the first time fully realized by those who were not in attendance. Not only was the street parade shown, but naval and land exhibitions, the unveiling of the Victoria monument, foreign diplomats in gorgeous costumes, the King's guards, and many other events of this world-wide celebration. Such reels might well be called an epoch-making period of history.

The Empress presented the second of the series of the Ft. Myer pictures of the Solax Company, that of "An Enlisted Man's Honor," on the day of release. Washington has taken quite an interest in these photoplays at its home fort while the cavalrymen themselves, who figure so conspicuously on the screen, were in large numbers in the audience throughout the entire day. The music played was in keeping with the drama.

The Howe Travelogues have become exceedingly popular here. The announcement of such a photographic lecture means a sold-out house. These have been sheltered in one of our big drama theaters, the Columbia Theater, where was presented on Sunday last a series of travels in Switzerland, Japan, Italy, Austria, and other countries. The most significant pictures were those of the Alps, showing a trip up dizzy heights, a snow storm, dangers of such travel, and the beauties of these snow-covered peaks. By special request, the Coronation film was repeated and enjoyed as much as on previous occasions.

The Feature Film Company is a new manufacturing organization in Washington, with offices on Ninth Street. It is headed by H. M. Crandall as president and Sig. G. Boernstein as general manager. Mr. Crandall is one of our most progressive exhibitors and an all-around business man, who will do much toward the success of the new enterprise. Mr. Boernstein has been associated with the Capital Film Company and stands high as a careful producer of photography in motion. He will be at the camera of this company and has already some new features to give to the public. The catch-line, "Every Film a Feature," is already in the mouths of the moving picture trade here. This is scarcely an official announcement of the company, as that will come later when more definite plans are formed in the fall. Until then The Feature Film Company will keep a little quiet. Since Boernstein has always been an Independent man and Crandall has recently espoused this cause with excellent success at his airdome, the Association will scarcely attract the organization.

The appearance on the screen recently of little Walter Peck in the May Procession of St. Aloysius Church, a reel taken by Sig. G. Boernstein, occasioned sadness to the spectators, as the little boy met with an accidental death not long after the taking of the picture. He was a chorister at St. Aloysius and the bright son of Captain Peck, of the District Police Department. Both friends and relatives of the little boy are pleased to know that he is so naturally living on a picture reel that will always be a comfort to them.

"The Truth About the North Pole," being presented at the Virginia, is being eagerly sought by Washingtonians. With Dr. Cook figuring so conspicuously in this reel, it will always hold an interest, especially by those who believe him as the discoverer of the pole, or at least as one sadly misrepresented by a jealous public.

Chicago, Ill.—P. M. Katz will erect a moving picture theater at 3116 Maple Square Avenue, to cost $12,000.

Wyanett, Ill.—C. A. Rollins, who has a moving picture show in Sheffield, will conduct a show in the Wyanett Opera House.

Barker's have the rights of filming the "Johnson-Wells" contest in September. Many boxing critics are busily denouncing this match on the ground that Wells cannot have a chance with the negro, but there have been surprises in boxing before now, and if there is one in this case, Barker's should make a pile, for the film will undoubtedly go much better if the white man wins. Mr. Barker is an old boxer himself, who won distinction as an amateur years back, and he is in a good position to judge of the probable pulling value of this fight and the film showing it, and the fact that he is taking the latter seems to indicate that there may not be quite so much walk-over about the matter as some people think.

About a month ago I heard good things from a gentleman just returned from the States, about the subjects of the Yankee Film Co., and expressed a desire for their introduction to the English market. This has since been accomplished by the Agency of Messrs. John Wrench & Son, of Grays Inn Road, who are one of the oldest makers of projectors in the market and have had not a little to do with introducing to the business men who have since made their mark in it. Messrs. Wrench have been mainly apparatus makers, but they took up the film business in years long ago, and the Yankee goods should do well in their hands if they are as good as I am told.

A year or so ago the Eclair "serial" subjects were the feature of the trade and "Nick Carter," "Rifle Bill," and "Morgan the Pirate" had hosts of admirers who greeted their succeeding adventures on the screen with the greatest enthusiasm. They have now invented another character, Zigomon, who should be just as popular as the foregoing. He is introduced in a 3,000-foot story, but there's no padding.

One had not to be in the first class as a prophet to predict the ultimate success of Scala-Kinemacolor, but undoubtedly the success has come rather earlier than many people anticipated, and in a measure that must make the managers of other London houses envious in the extreme. If you reckon up the capacity of the Scala and take into consideration the fact that every seat practically has been filled twice daily ever since the "Unveiling of the Queen Victoria Memorial" was put on, a little figuring will show you that for some six weeks or more the theater must have been drawing very little short of £1,000 weekly. Did I hear anyone say, after figures like these, that Kinemacolor is "not commercial"? Some of the other West End theaters who shut up in the summer because they cannot get paying audiences can hardly think so. Remember also, that besides being achieved in the hottest week of a particularly hot summer, this success has been made in a theater previously almost uniformly unsuccessful and the conclusion is forced upon you that Kinemacolor is "it" in the entertainment world of London at the present moment and looks like continually to be "it" for a long time.

When it was announced a week or so ago that King George had ordered the Royal Box to be reserved for him, even the last doubters held their breath. True, that the political crisis compelled the arrangement to be cancelled at the last moment, but the Prince of Wales came instead, and the more important visit is probably only postponed, while Mr. Urban has also had the privilege of presenting the pictures to Queen Alexandra privately at Sandringham and received the personal congratulations of Her Majesty, who was not present at the Coronation of her son and saw the procession of it the first time on the screen. The Dowager Empress of Russia, Princess Victoria and other Royalties were present and it was the first entertainment Queen Alexandra had seen for eighteen months.

We had begun to hope that the "duper" was dead in this country, but it seems we were too optimistic. So great has the evil recently become that a special meeting has had to be summoned to discuss ways and means of putting a stop to it. It is the American subjects which have been most largely duped, in particular those which Messrs. Markt & Co. handle in this country—Biograph, Kalem, and Lubin, and from the fact that Messrs. Markt are known to exercise particular care not to let their subjects get into the hands of doubtful persons, it appears probable that most of them come from America, particularly where, as in cases given, the "dupe" was shown in England before the release date of the film by Messrs. Markt & Co. English firms have, however, suffered as well, particularly Mr. Will G. Barker, who recently offered £100 reward for the discovery of the duper of one of his specials. What appears to be wanted in the first case is an amendment to the Copyright Bill at present before Parliament, which would give the film makers a stronger legal position in prosecuting dupers, than they possess under the present law, which was drawn when the Kinematograph was unknown.

Barker Motion Photography, Ltd.'s staff are an exceptionally happy family. Mr. Barker knows how to choose his workers and the consequence is that there is not a more loyal or hardworking band than those who produce the "Bull Dog" subjects. Working hard as they do—an "all night shift" is the most common of all experiences with them. Barker's put the same energy into their recreation, and good humored joking is a feature of Soho Square, and on the various festive occasions on which the staff foregather with their families and friends. One of these latter fell last Saturday when a garden party was given at the studio at Ealing. There was a "Guide" to this who was a masterpiece of humor, and the grounds themselves were made beautiful by notices pointing to "The Water Chute" and sundry other attractions which we did not remember to have remarked before and which as a matter of fact were equally conspicuous by their absence on this occasion, while sports of a variegated kind followed.

More trouble seems to be in store for the London showman, if the suggestion of the Fire Brigade Committee of the London County Council is adopted. This committee places before the Council on Tuesday proposals for increasing the staff which inspects places of amusement, owing to the increase in the number of kinematograph theaters, and they suggested that the cost of making inspections shall be recoverable from the licensee, either through the medium of license fees or otherwise. The Finance Committee backs up this proposal, and it seems not unlikely therefore that the showman will have the satisfaction shortly of paying for the services of the gentlemen who come to find fault with their appointments.

Walturdaw's are agents here for the Carson films, whose first subject they will release on Sept. 3, and this, one of the oldest established firms in the trade, and the original renting house, is showing many other signs of vitality. Two new departments which they have recently started, being an employment bureau for picture theater employees, and another department for the sale of living picture properties.

Dear Sir:—As an exhibitor I was much interested in the article "Exhibitors" in the last issue of the News and much pleased with the action taken recently at Cleveland by the First National Convention of Exhibitors' League in forming an insurance company exclusively for exhibitors. Now, we can get nothing without "hitting the nail continually on the head," I would suggest that the company give us their address and other particulars through the columns of the News.

"THE OUTLAW"

In the production of the Western Cowboy pictures, to be true to life it is necessary to introduce that other product of our Western country, "The Outlaw." By whatever name or sobriquet he is called, "bad man," "rustler," "desperado," or "gunfighter," the Western outlaw is unquestionably a product of the cattle range; a land free of restraint; a country where the primal instincts of men engulfed the veneer of society and civilized ways, and their baser instincts leaped forth because of no organized restraint.

The civilized empire of the West has grown in spite of this as the love of law and righteousness anciently planted in the souls of men is strongly developed in "The American Cowboy." It frequently happened that the "good man" who went out after the "bad man" was not much better as to deeds than the desperado, but his motives were better. The Western sheriff was frequently chosen to represent "law and order" chiefly because he was a good fighting man.

We, in these latter days, band together and "elect" political representatives who do not represent us at all. We "elect" executive officers who execute nothing but their own wishes. We pay innumerable policemen to take from our shoulders the burden of self-protection, and are not protected.

Back of all law is the undelegated personal right, that vague thing which none the less is recognized in all the laws and charters of the world. If there is in you no hot blood to break out into flame and set you arbiter for yourself in some sharp crucial moment, you are fit neither as a man or citizen.

There are "bad men" the world over; the white "bad man" is the worst of all, but the king pin of the lot is the Western white "bad man."

Desperate evils require desperate remedies; hence the gun-fighting sheriff, fearing nothing, asking nothing, giving nothing; dealing out justice, according to the primal instincts by which he is environed, "An eye for an eye and a life for a life."

In producing a Western picture it is not necessary to promote absurd and melodramatic impressions regarding the Western outlaw. The truth itself is thrilling enough and in presenting this character the American Film Manufacturing Company excel because of the fidelity with which the life of the early West is followed in American productions.

AMENDMENT TO ORDINANCE

Moving Picture Men Allowed to Retain Signs

Special to "The News"

Fort Worth, Tex., Aug. 8.—The City Commission this afternoon adopted an amendment to the ordinance creating censors for picture shows. The amendment changes the new ordinance so that it does not provide for interference with the lurid pictures placed at the entrances of the shows. The proprietors claimed that if they were compelled to remove these pictures they would lose 30 per cent of their business and could not stand the loss.

"A TRAITOR TO HIS COUNTRY"

Great Northern Release, August 26th

Lieutenant Dobrinow, a rejected suitor to General Zodanoff's daughter, is in league and conspiracy with the enemies of his country to sell them certain important plans and war documents. To revenge himself for the humiliation of refusal received at the hands of the general's daughter, he causes suspicion for the theft of the plans to fall on his successful rival, Lieutenant Orlof. The general in due course discovers, much to his amazement, the loss of the papers, and, as prearranged by Dobrinow, suspicion falls upon the innocent Orlof, who after a brief trial is court martialed and sentenced to suffer the penalty of death. Friends of Orlof, however, who are confident of his innocence, make every effort to track the real offender, and eventually Lieutenant Dobrinow is suspected. His movements confirm the suspicion. He is followed and arrested in secret conclave with representatives of the enemy. The mistake of Orlof's arrest is soon made clear to General Zodanoff, who instantly sends a messenger post haste to stop the execution. The messenger arrives in the nick of time, and the innocent officer is released at once, whereupon he is soon at the side of his sweetheart.

"HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS"

Reliance Release, August 19th

Margaret and Louise are sisters, the former being the elder and no longer young. She reads a notice in a newspaper that Prince Elbert is due to arrive in the village to spend a few days and bidding Louise stay at home and attend to the work in the kitchen she goes foraging for the Prince.

She meets an escaped lunatic whose form of lunacy is peculiar in that he imagines himself a prince. He goes to a costumer's and hires a crown, cloak and sword and sallies forth. He is met by Margaret, who is delighted. She has beaten all the other women in the village in making the acquaintance of the prince and is smitten by his charms. They walk about the village, Margaret the envy of all the women.

In the meantime the real prince arrives and in strolling about the village unnoticed he happens upon Louise at the well, drawing a bucket of water. He gallantly assists her and is having the lark of his life in helping her about the kitchen, being impressed by her charms. He goes after leaving his card which proves him the prince.

Margaret is led by the bogus prince to the insane asylum where he is taken into custody and his identity revealed. She returns home and is chagrined to learn that the younger sister has been entertaining the prince, but finally congratulates the happy girl.

"VIEWS OF HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS"

Imp Release, August 28th

An educational and scenic picture, showing the celebrated ostrich farm, the alligator farm and other views in and about the famous health resort, selected with care and making a reel of much interest to the student and lover of natural history.

"THE TOSS OF A COIN"

Imp Release, August 31st

Dan Gardner, a young man, is down and out. Arrested as a tramp he is thrown into jail and forced to associate with disreputable characters. He is released and, with but a single coin in his pocket, sets out to walk across the country.

Arriving at a bridge over a stream, he gazes into the water and his thoughts turn to suicide. He reaches in his pocket, extracts the coin and flips it up, head he dies and tail he lives. Fate is against him and he is about to carry out the decree when his preserver, Farmer Barton, drives on the scene. Mr. Barton is bound for the village to hire a man to assist him in his farm work. Dan is more than anxious to secure employment and accompanies the kind-hearted farmer home. Dan is fitted out with clothing and takes up his quarters in a detached cabin on the farm.

Alice Barton is the rosy-cheeked daughter of the farmer and has attracted the attention of Ed. White, the sheriff, who released Dan from jail. Dan and the girl are thrown much in each others society and the new farmhand loves her. Assisting her one day in the field where she has sprained her ankle, the truth is forced home to him. He realizes the difference in their stations and resolves to leave the farm and go out into the world again. He flips the coin and once more fate decrees that he should do that which is not satisfactory to him.

The two thieves who were released from prison with him come to steal the money of the farmer and, while Dan is temporarily absent from his cabin, Alice comes to bring him some socks she has darned. Ed White, the jealous sheriff, notices the action and mistrusts the girl of being unduly intimate with Dan and informs her parents. Dan arrests the scoundrels, holding them up at the point of a gun, and they are turned over to the sheriff, but he is indignant at the accusation of White and is about to leave the farm when his deed of heroism is made clear to the farmer, who has implicit faith in his daughter.

Dan and Alice have a pretty little love scene and Dan is welcomed by the honest old farmer as his prospective son-in-law to the discomfiture of the sheriff, who sought to prejudice the old man against him. All ends happily for Dan and he has at last found a home among kind and loving friends.

"GULNARA"

Ambrosio Release, August 23d

Sathas, a Greek traitor, joins the Turkish army, and abducts Gulnara, the beautiful wife of Zacarias, a Greek warrior. The husband disguises himself as a Dervish and succeeds in securing admission to the palace. He is recognized by Sathas, arrested and thrown in jail. In a sensational scene Gulnara slays the Pasha, and takes his ring, which is a badge of authority. The use of the ring permits her to reach her husband's side, and the couple plan to escape by means of a rope. Gulnara descends safely, but as her husband follows Sathas appears at the window and cuts the rope, dashing Zacarias to the rocks. A pathetic finale is shown as Gulnara sorrows over the body of her husband.

"GRANDFATHER"

Reliance Release, August 19th

Alice Horton's favored suitor is George Blake. His rival, favored by her father, is Jim Harris. The clash of the men bring forth some interesting situations. Mr. Horton places some money in his desk, and old grandfather secretes it in the fireplace. As George was the last man seen in the room he is suspected of the theft, and having ridden away on horseback Alice gallops after him. Indignant, he returns to face his accusers, and is placed under arrest by the sheriff, Jim Harris giving false evidence against him. Grandfather awakes from a doze, and when he learns what the commotion is about remembers his action and gets the money. Mr. Horton is mortified at his unjust accusation of George, and willingly consents to his marriage to Alice.

"THE MOTH"

Thanhouser Release, August 29th

A young man of the class described as "a city chap," decided to spend his vacation in the country, and made a profound impression upon the villagers who were honored by having him in their midst. He was so neat, so well dressed, that the rural swains found themselves cast in the background, and his conduct in wearing dress clothes after the magic hour of six p. m. created more excitement than did county politics.

It was natural that he should have made a profound impression upon the belle of the village, and even her mother heartily approved of him. For "Ma" was a housekeeper of the old school, and kept her house so clean that it was really a hardship to go into it. At least that was what the men said privately.

But the "city chap" made an impression from the start. He always wiped his shoes on entering the house, and his attire was a pleasure to the eye. So for a time the visitor was first favorite.

But a moth, one little unhappy moth, was the cause of his undoing. "Ma" found the moth in her home, and her anguish was intensified when she discovered that he had been dining on some of her winter clothes. So she determined to exterminate him and any other members of his family who might be lurking about the place.

At the village drug store she secured some "Moth Candles," guaranteed to light any moth to an unwept grave. The directions were to light these candles after closing all the windows and doors, and then wait for results.

"Ma" did as she was told. Having some spare time on her hands, she and her daughter paid a call on a neighbor and whiled away the weary hours discussing the trials of housekeeping.

While they were away the "city chap" dropped around to pay a call upon the young woman he admired. He saw smoke curling under the door, and realized that the place was on fire. And having his chance to be a hero he seized it promptly.

It was the work of a few minutes to arouse the villagers. The energetic young city chap fairly hummed around, organized a bucket brigade, and under his directions they poured countless gallons of water on the structure, smashed in the doors, and "saved" the furniture by hurling it out of the windows. But he saved the house all right and waited modestly for a few kind words when "Ma" came home.

He imagined she would nearly faint with joy. He was correct except as to the joy part. In a few well-chosen words she told him what she thought of him, and explained that much as she loathed moths they would be far more welcome as guests than he would be.

He never saw the girl again. In fact, he did not remain to bid her good-bye. But he believed that he was unjustly treated, and that some women are extremely unkind.

"ROMEO AND JULIET"

Thanhouser Release, Friday, Sept. 1st

Part One

The play tells of two rival noble families of Verona, who for several generations have been bitter foes. The offspring of these families, Juliet, the daughter of the Capulets, and Romeo, son of the Montagues meet and love, before they know that, on account of the family feud, they can never be united in marriage. Their love is too strong, however, to permit anything to stand in its way, and knowing they can never obtain their parents' consent they are secretly wed.

Shortly after this young Romeo is banished from Padua for dueling, and is compelled to bid his young bride farewell. During his absence Capulet endeavors to force his daughter, Juliet, to marry a nobleman he has chosen for her.

In her distress Juliet turns to the Friar who secretly married them. This kindly old man agrees to help the lovers. He gives Juliet a sleeping potion, which, after she has taken it, will make her seem dead. It is his intention to take the supposedly dead Juliet from her tomb, and reunite her to her banished husband.

He sends a message to Romeo, telling him of the plan, but unfortunately news of Juliet's death reached Romeo before the Friar's message. The distracted youth purchases a vial of poison, and taking it with him to the tomb, where he finds the apparently lifeless body of Juliet, he drains the deadly potion. Juliet revives soon after this, and finding on the steps of the tomb the body of her beloved husband, takes her own life. When the Friar arrives upon the scene, intending to free Juliet and unite the lovers, he finds them already united in death.

The first reel gives the spectator the complete story of Romeo's romantic courting of the fair Juliet, showing the sequence in the daring secret marriage.

"A DAUGHTER OF DIXIE"

Champion Release, August 28th

The story here presented gives a picture of how some of those noble women demonstrated that the stuff of which heroes are made belongs not exclusively to the male gender. We see in this film the charging hosts of the blue and the grey; now victory perches on the banners of the Confederacy, and the next moment the Union boys dash madly into the fray and with joyous shout and wild huzza Old Glory floats in the breeze. And so it goes on in various scenes, but towering above all is the quiet, heroic work of the Southern girl, Nell Collings.

She loved Newton Barry with all the warmth of the sunny southern clime—Barry was a Northern boy, but this happened before hostilities had started. When that dreadful thing happened, Barry bade his sweetheart good-bye and went away to don the Union blue.

Nell's brother fought for the South, and so it came about that these two met in a peculiar way. The fortunes of war had brought a battle right to the doors of Nell, and two of the participants in that battle were Newton Barry, the sweetheart, and Tom Collings, the brother. Newton, slightly wounded and separated from his comrades, took refuge in the home of his sweetheart. The Confederates tracked him there, led on by Tom.

Nell had hidden Newton in a secret closet and he would have escaped the searcher's notice had not Tom been one of them. Newton stepped forth and it looked as if the day was lost to him, but Nell became equal to the emergency. Seizing a musket from one of the troopers, she held it at her brother's breast and there kept it until Newton was far away on his journey.

You may imagine how stirring the atmosphere was, but suffice it to say that all went well and when the war was over Tom was one of the first to join in the glad welcome extended to Newton on his joyous return to wed his beloved sister, Nell.

"HOW TONY BECAME A HERO"

Champion Release, August 30th

A band of marauding Indians ransack a ranch, when suddenly a bunch of cowboys dash upon the scene, and it does one's heart good to see them dispersed. Mounted on a jackass, or a burro, Tony is complacently jogging along, when the Indians fall upon him. He frantically leaps off and climbs a tall tree, while the redskins build a fire below. The dense smoke compells Tony to descend, and he is unceremoniously seized and dragged to their camp.

Then is enacted the old story of Pocahontas again, for no less a person than the chief's daughter falls in love with Tony. Aided by her, they elude the vigilance of his captors and flee the camp. The pair dash away, Tony clinging to the neck of the horse like a monkey in a circus, as the Indian maiden bends forward, urging on her steed, and thus they dash into the midst of the cowboys, whose astonishment is only equalled by their uproarious mirth.

The cowboys now decide to hold the Indian maiden as a hostage until the Indians return the things they have stolen. This seems a bright idea, but Tony shows them he can go them one better.

At a designated point the Indians come to carry out the arrangements, where Tony is guarding the chief's daughter. Tony has gotten hold of some wine, and he sees that it goes around freely, pretending to imbibe himself of the juice which inebriates. The treacherous redskins, if they lay hands on the girl, will make off with her, and they are watching their chance to play false to their agreement.

The old chief pleads with Tony to be allowed to see his daughter. Tony consents and even grants permission to all the other Indians to do likewise. This looks like imbecilic simplicity on Tony's part, but the moment they have all entered where the Indian girl is held in durance bang goes the doors, barred hard and fast, and Tony, the despised and most ridiculed of youths, becomes for all time a personage of more than ordinary importance in the eyes of the cowboys, and well worthy of their respect and confidence. That is how Tony became a hero.

"A COWBOY'S LOYALTY"

Bison Release, Tuesday, August 22d

Jack quarrels with Dolores, a dance hall girl, and then flirts with Inez. Dolores is very jealous, and in retaliation flirts with Dick. This does not affect Jack, who is having an enjoyable time with Inez, and Dolores shows her displeasure in various ways.

Finally Dolores decides to go home, and accompanied by Dick goes to the cloak room. Dolores is in a fearful temper, and Mary, who is putting on her wraps, steps behind the cloaks to eavesdrop. Inez and Jack dance past the door, and Inez sneers at Dolores, who impulsively grabs the gun from Dick's holster and fires into the ballroom.

Jack falls, mortally wounded, and Dick barricades the door of the cloak room. The sheriff and the cowboys attack the door, and Dick forces Dolores to escape through a window. He then surrenders, confessing that he did the shooting, and is locked up in jail.

Dolores tells a friend of Dick's predicament, and he agrees to help him. That night they go to the jail, and under cover of the darkness saw off the bars of the window, and Dick and Dolores escape, and by daylight are far away. The ordeal through which they have passed has had a sobering effect, and they get married and resolve to live down the past.

Mary goes to the sheriff and tells him what she saw while concealed in the dressing room. He hurries to the jail and discovers that Dick has escaped.

Five years later Dick and Dolores are living happily together, the proud parents of a handsome child. Inez, leading a nomadic life, comes in the vicinity and recognizes the couple. For revenge she writes to the sheriff of the old town telling where he can find Dolores.

The sheriff mounts his horse and travels to the home of Dick and Dolores. A pretty domestic scene is presented, and when the sheriff sees the child caressed by its mother his heart fails him, and he slowly tears the warrant up and departs.

"MUTT AND JEFF AND THE COUNTRY JUDGE"

Nestor Release, August 26th

When last we heard of the hard-luck twins, Mutt and Jeff, they closed their banking office and were once more members of the "down-and-out" club.

Patching up their troubles as best they can, the long and the short of it decide to leave the cruel, cold city and go in search of pastures new. They stray into the country to commune with nature and evolve, perhaps, some means whereby to make both ends meet.

They wander down the seemingly endless country road, each with a far-away look, thinking all sorts of despairing thoughts, and unaware of the friendly greetings, the joyous smiles, the ready bows and the sweet whispers of trees, grass and zephyrs. On Jeff's face one may see Dante's Inferno, while Mutt's shrinking visage is too eloquent for mere words. Suddenly his optics twinkle and shoot forth a shaft of hope upon the hopeless Jeff.

Mutt has collided with a truly brilliant idea—an idea that is sure to work well. If the banking business is bad, why not try automobiling? There are plenty of autos whizzing past the country road; all that Jeff has to do is to "get in touch" with one of the horseless things and—well, leave it to Mutt to collect damages.

Like all the ideas propounded by Mutt, this one also gains the disapproval of Jeff. He cannot see why he should be the goat and buck a bucking automobile. Mutt's logic, however, finally overmasters the unhappy little fellow and he's ready for the sacrifice.

The plan is finely executed, for Jeff gets fairly well mussed up and Mutt gets ten dollars for—funeral expenses. What happens after this is so excruciatingly funny that even the solemn-faced country judge cannot keep his judicial composure. A series of serious things befall the crafty Mutt, who finally is made to "cough up" that accursed ten spot.

Jeff, nicely bumped up, and Mutt, defeated but not disgraced, once more qualify for the "down-and-out" club.

"ALIAS YELLOWSTONE JOE"

Nestor Release, August 23d

Joe Murdock, alias Yellowstone Joe, cattle rustler and general desperado, had at last been captured—much to the satisfaction of Sheriff Dillon, who after seeing his prisoner locked in the jail, and placing Deputy Wilson on guard, hurried home to tell his daughter of the exciting capture.

Here, however, he was met by a messenger, who advised him that the gang of which Yellowstone was captain, had already crossed the lines into his county. Hastily mounting his horse, the sheriff, accompanied by his daughter, who pleaded to ride as far as the cross-roads, to hear the rest of the story, started off to organize a posse. In the meanwhile, Yellowstone, by using his knife on the old lock, had not only succeeded in prying it off, but listening until he heard Wilson at the other end of the yard, had slipped out—stolen to the back of the jail, where the deputy's horse was fastened, and galloped away before his escape was discovered.

Entering the woods, where he had commanded his men to assemble, the leader gave their bird-like call, which was instantly answered by his followers; but scarcely had he joined them, when they heard someone approaching;—it proved to be the sheriff's daughter returning home, and had Long Bill not insisted upon kissing her, all might have gone well, for the girl recognized Yellowstone, to whom she had given a glass of water as he passed with her father on his way to the jail, appealed to him for assistance. Instantly a quarrel arose between the men,—ending in Yellowstone being bound to a tree, while his treacherous followers silently drew for the fatal card. Luckily, as Shorty pinned the terrible ace of spades over the leader's heart and stepped back to take aim, the sheriff and his men were heard approaching.

Leaping into their saddles, the rustlers madly dashed away—closely followed by the entire posse—for the girl called to them that she would guard Yellowstone Joe. Instead, however, not only did she release her protector, but likewise gave him her horse and gun that he might make good his escape.

"THE POWER OF DEVOTION"

Yankee Film Co. Release, August 28th

Much has been said of the power of gold, but very little of the power of true love or devotion.

When Jack Mason, the successful Wall Street magnate, becomes insane from overwork, his insanity takes the form of hatred and jealousy toward his loyal wife, whose love he had no reason of doubting. Even after he attempts to kill her and is sent to a sanitarium as a dangerous maniac, she remains the devoted wife and loving sweetheart of his early days.

When information comes of his escape from the sanitarium, and the fact that he cannot be found, she takes up the search single-handed amid the mountainous haunts they used to frequent in their courting days. Instinct tells her that he would make for these haunts and instinct, woman's great reason, is right.

Emaciated and ragged, she finds him in one of their former trysting places and in attempting to escape from her he falls down a deep cliff and is found there unconscious and bleeding. The fall proved a blessing, for when he regains consciousness his reason returns. The first face he gazes upon is that of his devoted wife, and her constant care and devotion brings him back to health and perfect reason.

"A GREAT WRONG RIGHTED"

Yankee Film Co. Release September 1st

After having drank himself into poverty, Zeke Thompson, a young sailor, realizes the error of his ways and turns to seek other means of support for himself and loving wife who stuck to him through all circumstances.

Intent upon obtaining money, he goes to his father's home and comes in time to interrupt a burglar at his work. A struggle ensues in which Zeke is felled by a blunt instrument, and when he recovers consciousness his mind has become a total blank.

His hat is left in the room and is discovered by his father, who suspects his son of having robbed him. Wandering along the docks he is easily persuaded to ship as a deck-hand upon an outgoing steamer.

In the meantime, the burglar who was also a sailor, flushed with the success of his robbery, seeks the "cup that cheers," and is soon in a semi-conscious state. While in this condition he is shanghaied and placed aboard the same vessel that Zeke, his victim has been put on. While on deck, after realizing he had been robbed and shanghaied, he comes face to face with Zeke and after a moment realizes that his blow had deprived Zeke of memory. Remorse sets in and he tries to recall to Zeke the scene of the conflict. Fate is indeed strange in its actions, for the men become fast friends. A wreck occurs and Zeke saves the life of his companion, almost sacrificing his own. A blow on the head during the rescue brings back his memory and he first learns that his sailing companion is the man who had robbed his father.

Zeke becomes ill and his companion nurses him back to health and strength. They are rescued by a passing ship and on their journey home Zeke forgives his companion, knowing that the man has repented, and takes him along to his home.

The sailor confesses to Zeke's father that he was the guilty one and Zeke, vowing never to touch liquor again, is clasped in the arms of his loving wife.

"A GAY BACHELOR"

Solax Release, August 23d

Mr. James, a gay old bachelor, meets a bewitching and flirtatious widow at the beach and becomes so attached to her asks permission to call at her city home. He finally proposes marriage and is accepted, when to his horror he finds that she is the mother of five children. His friend advises him to go to an orphanage where he succeeds in getting the matron to lend him five children whom he presents to the widow, representing them to be his own. But to his consternation she accepts them all with open arms, and poor James has to make the best of the bargain.

"THE STAMPEDE"

Solax Release, August 26th

A troop from a western post is in pursuit of a band of smugglers. Sergeant Cooper is sent with a message telling them to return to post, but on his way he stops to see his sweetheart, where he is captured by the chief of the band. The chief sends his men back to the post for the purpose of stampeding the horses while he takes after the girl. She escapes and tries to stop the stampede, but is forced to flee before the onrush of the terrified animals. Cooper makes his escape and arrives just in time to rescue his sweetheart and capture the brigand.

"THE WHITE CHIEF"

Powers Release, August 29th

Bright Eyes, an Indian maid, marries a white trapper. He leaves her alone with an infant. Bright Eyes, not knowing what to do, returns to her tribe, but before doing so hides her babe in the bushes on the bank of the river. She is received back in the tribe and when the squaws are sent for water the babe is found. She, keeping the secret, asks to be allowed to raise the babe, which is granted. After twenty years, Stalwart Brave, the papoose, contests for the Chieftainship in the Lariat Duel on horseback. He defeats the champion and becomes the White Chief. He falls in love with the old chief's daughter, but is denied her. The brave he defeated for revenge on the old chief lashes him to the back of a large alligator, from which he is rescued by the White Chief, and wins the girl.

"SILVER TAIL AND HIS SQUAW"

Released September 2d

Silver Tail, an Indian brave and Panther, members of the Seminole tribe, are both in love with Falling Water, an Indian squaw. Panther makes ardent love and eventually proposes, but much to his surprise Falling Water spurns him. Panther leaves her in rage, vowing revenge. Falling Water is sent by the chief of the tribe to a raneh to exchange skins for necessities. Panther, who overhears the chief give her instructions, sees his chance for revenge and plots with a Mexican to capture her, which they do, and tearing her from her horse lash her to the back of it and send it galloping through the woods. Silver Tail observes the look of satisfaction which overspreads Panther's face, and feeling mischief is on foot, follows them. He arrives on the scene in time to see the squaw's horse dashing madly through the woods, gives chase and captures it in time to save Falling Water from a horrible death.

A MARRIAGE IN THE STARS

Eclair Release, August 28th

Pretty Jeanne Debray is in love with her cousin Raymond; gentle Mrs. Debray favors the attachment, but Mr. Debray, suddenly becoming aware of the truth, drives Raymond from the house. Encouraged by Mrs. Debray, the young man returns to ask for the hand of his love, but the occasion is inopportune for Mr. Debray is suffering from a violent toothache. The lover departs, heartbroken, and Jeanne gives herself over to despair. Gazing at the laudanum her father is applying to his tooth, she contemplates suicide. The mother anticipates her, and replaces the drug with water. The lovers agree upon a suicide pact—if they cannot be united on earth, they will join each other among the stars. They meet at the last trysting place, and after swallowing the supposed poison, embrace, eagerly awaiting death. There they are discovered by the agitated father and the composed mother, still waiting for death! Papa repents of his cruelty, and the lovers gladly abandon their dreams of the stars!

AN OBLIGING YOUNG MAN

Percy, a well-bred, delightful young fellow, feels it incumbent upon himself to render assistanee to his fellow-being whenever the opportunity presents itself. In his eagerness not to miss an occasion, Percy often finds himself in some rather 'tight" places. We see how he manages to carry an old lady's grip, restore a lost handkerchief, and do numerous other acts of courtesy all at once—and the results! He swings a lady who has a tired husband, helps catch a thief, assists a dentist, all in a jiffy, and the film ends in a most astonishing climax, which proves a new maxim, "Courtesy is its own reward."

CASTLES IN THE AIR

Rex Release, August 24th

Castles in the air,
Dreams so sweet and fair,
Ah, just take me there,
To dream-castles in the air,
Where there is no thought of care.

Who has not sat down at times and trod among the clouds? Who has not built fairy, airy castles in the air? Who has not dreamed that Paradise was his private grounds, or that he held a mortgage on the Garden of Eden?

Bedelia, the maid, is berated by her mistress for tardiness, and ruminating on her hard lot in life, falls asleep. Then a sweet dreamlet gets on the job and works overtime.

Bedelia becomes mistress of the house, and the real master and mistress become man and maid, who obsequiously obey her orders and whom she scolds and reprimands with the haughtiness of a duchess. She falls heir to a paltry million, and acquires social ambitions. She puts a personal in the newspapers, stating that she would be pleased to entertain a lord. Of course, the lord calls. Lord, what a dream!

Automobiling, yachting, entertaining, follow in quick and rapturous succession, until—oh, until; for all happy dreams culminate in a rude awakening. Bedelia opens her eyes with a start—a start of the old ways and the old habits again. Dreamland has vanished, Paradise is lost, and Bedelia goes back to nature—and the kitchen.

AUSTRALIAN NEWS

FOUR open air shows were compelled to close down in Perth on account of change of weather.

That wonderful historic subject, "The Fall of Troy," produced by the Itala Film Company, is at present being screened in Australia. Reports come from all parts of the Commonwealth that full houses witnessed this extraordinary production.

I am informed that Mr. C. Spencer has secured the sole agency in Australia for the Thanhouser Film Company. This is a splendid move for Mr. Spencer as well as for the Thanhouser Company.

A splendid example of the quality of drama welcomed by the Australian audiences is shown in the Western subject "In the Land of the Cactus," enacted by the "Flying A Company" of Chicago. There have been but few "Flying A" pictures shown in W. A. and in every town where this picture was presented to the public it was cheered to an echo.

Wild Western subjects take excellently here, as well as good comedies, such as Imp's "Her Generous Way," shown a few months back, and a Vitagraph comedy, "The New Stenographer," which is the "screamer" shown this week at West's Perth.

The general manager of West's Pictures, Ltd., Mr. H. Gee, just recently paid a visit from Sydney to Western Australia to "make things hum," as he termed it. A dinner was given by the management to enable Mr. Gee to meet the W. A. staff. The general manager made a rattling fine speech, which left a deep impression on every employee.

During his short visit he signed several contracts, and arranged for three new theaters to be built, which will be described later. With his many skilful plans and new ideas he intends giving the opposition a severe bump.

Messrs. S. S. Crick and H. Finlay have severed their connection with Pathe Freres, and are now producing Australian bushranging dramas. Mr. Crick has been manager for Pathe's in Sydney since the opening day of that branch. They have started business at 75 York street, Sydney. Two dramas have already been released, "Ben Hall and His Gang" and "Frank Gardiner, King of the Road." This new company has included some wonderful features in order to make the subjects a phenomenal success.

Beauty competitions seem to be the novelty at present in the picture shows of Australia. Entries were invited by Hoyt's of Melbourne and as many as 200 girls replied. The number was reduced by the management to 88, who will compete for the twenty guineas and several other prizes that are offered. The public judge by ballot; this method giving each young lady every satisfaction. The girls are cinematographed and the pictures presented to the public every night for three weeks.

West's of Sydney made the public very enthusiastic with their "Sirens of the Surf" competition. The event was splendidly photographed, for which Mr. A. J. Moulton has the credit, and was shown at all West's picture palaces throughout Australasia. A Perth show endeavored to try the novelty, but were not so successful as those in the Eastern States.

THE PRESS AND THE PICTURES

Every now and again we are treated to some newspaper news article, or editorial, denouncing the moving picture shows and characterizing them as nurseries for almost every conceivable vice, particularly pernicious to the young. But we very, very seldom read in the daily press about anything the moving pictures do for the public good. People who do not always think deep enough have attributed this pronounced and unconcealed animosity to an ignorance of the real facts on the part of the editor, or to an over-captiousness on the part of the reporters handing in the stories.

Possibly both views are correct, but one good reason, or at least one good "alleged reason" for the bitterness of the press against photoplays is that they are rarely advertised except by the big music halls, where they are introduced only as "incidentals," and mentioned only casually in the advertisements. Newspapers, it should be remembered, are not very tolerant. They are opposed, as a business principle, to almost everything and everybody that does not, directly or indirectly, give them advertising. They can't see any possible good in any industry which does not yield them some financial benefit. They have no particular interest in "knocking" the picture shows, but, on the other hand, neither have they any interest in NOT knocking them. They are not paid for protection, so every time there is a chance to whack at the motion picture places they are handed the whack, all right.

The chances are that both the editors and reporters would deny this, but the denial would not prove anything. There is no getting away from the fact that the daily newspapers of the country are decidedly unfriendly to moving pictures, and the only really believable reason is the one adduced. But it would be obviously impossible for the average five and ten-cent shows, such as are scattered all over our large cities, to use the daily papers as advertising mediums. In the first place, the rates are prohibitory to the managers of amusement ventures of that calibre, and in the second place, if one advertised in a single paper he would be harassed by the solicitors for the other papers for his "business," and he certainly could not afford to advertise in all.

It is significant, by the way, that a goodly number of the photoplays have "boosted" the newspapers and newspaper men. Quite a number of the films have shown how the modern newspaper is prepared for its readers, and many dramas have been based upon reporters getting a "scoop" or editors charitably withholding injurious news items, or publishing others, gratuitously that would help someone who needed such assistance. But there are few signs of reciprocity along the line. No matter how the moving pictures may boost the newspapers and newspaper men, the latter seem determined not to let up in their invectives against the picture shows.

But, powerful as the press unquestionably is, it cannot inflict any material or permanent injury upon the photo plays and motion pictures. Their present and increasing popularity is assured, because they contain all the elements of attractiveness to make and keep them popular. They have cheapened amusements for the poorer classes, and, in many cases, bettered them, sufficient reasons why they will—and must—survive the occasional bitter onslaughts of the press.

Gentlemen:—

The Power's No. 6 arrived Monday and is now installed and I want to tell you that I am what Eli Perkins called a "damphool" for not installing one sooner; it is marvelous and has already caused lots of talk and increased patronage.

Before installing it I made arrangements with one of the local merchants and had it on exhibition in the show window, where I personally explained the fine points and told them The Lyric always believed in giving the best for the money.

You can rest assured I will always boost your No. 6.

Yours truly,

Dear Sirs:—After running your No. 6 machine six months, I took it apart and reassembled it. This I did to clean the machine and I find that no part of the machine shows the least amount of wear, and this in the face of running the machine thirteen hours a day, six days a week.

I consider this a most remarkable performance.

The reason I write you this letter is because I am so pleased with the work of the machine, which has never caused one moment of trouble.

Yours truly,

TO EXHIBITORS

WE wonder if the exhibitors at large are fully aware of the power they have in their hands in the form of the Moving Picture League of America? The last three issues of our paper give full information concerning the League, and before dropping the matter for the present, we want to make an appeal to every exhibitor whom the Moving Picture News reaches, to align himself with either a City, State or a National organization, as per Mr. Christensen's statement in our last issue. The statement is very concise, and very much to the point, and we feel sure that if the platform as outlined is carried out the industry will advance by leaps and bounds.

One point we want to forcibly bring before our readers is the statement that the membership is open to bona fide exhibitors, providing such exhibitor is not in any way connected with the manufacturing of films or film exchanges. This is as it should be. We have long contended that it is not right for either a manufacturer or a film exchange to own houses to the detriment of their customers—the exhibitors. It is quite open to question that the exchange is sure to look after its own houses first, and their customers second, instead of the other way about—the exhibitors first and the exchange taking the remainder.

The objects of the Association to raise the standard of the film stories and secure recognition on the National Censor Board have our full approval, and if by any means a word from us will bring every exhibitor into line, we feel that "A word to the wise is sufficient."

A THIRD PARTY

WE received a letter from a prominent exhibitor asking us why we do not "knock the wind" out of the sails of the Patents Company. We replied to this correspondent that the Patents Company was like the "Rock of Gibraltar," and if we run our bark against it, we would come very much to grief. We are only fighting against them on the question of principle and right for the whole industry, and have no quarrel with them except on this point. We respect them, and honor them, also, for the manner in which they are producing pictures; pictures which well might be emulated by the Sales Company's members. It is only because of the methods they adopted to tie up the trade that we oppose them.

In the course of this letter we are asked to support a Third Party in contradistinction to the Sales Company. This is a pretty hard task for any one to undertake, because, while we do not hold any brief for the Sales Company, if it had not been for them we question if any exhibitor would have been able to have remained in business till to-day. The Sales Company has fought a fight, and won a victory, which would have been impossible without their aid and any third party desiring now to come into the business without proper pro rata payment we think is bad policy. But supposing the Third Party is formed, on what grounds will they work? The following letter will give one: Just a system to gain money from the exchanges by wild-goose, or should we say wild-cat schemes. The letter speaks for itself, and shows that all the Third Party is trying to get is "easy money." After digesting the letter thoroughly, if any exchange man is foolish enough to withdraw his allegiance from the Sales Company on his own head must lie the results.

Dear Sir:

Replying to your letter requesting details of our proposition, we beg to say that a matter of this nature is not a proper subject for detailed correspondence. However, we feel that you are entitled to know substantially the proposition, and we give you below sufficient in our opinion to enable you to determine whether it would be wise and profitable for you to make a trip to our city as suggested in a former communication. We have to apologize for being forced to request your presence here; but we have been inundated by letters of inquiry regarding our proposition and concluded that no other course was left, believing in this manner the live ones would naturally be the ones to respond.

Firstly, our proposition for Exchanges covers exclusive territory. We have subdivided the United States into 25 territorial subdivisions, corresponding to 25 exchanges. Each territory chosen with reference to population and includes sufficient to make possible a live exchange for the territory, buying a minimum of twelve reels in any case and more in others according to the territory. We, therefore, require in every case a guarantee to purchase weekly twelve reels or more minimum, according to territory. Price per foot for film is ten cents. All films are leased for a period of one year. We require a bond for the faithful performance of contract. Every exchange operating with the National franchise is to be known as the National Film Exchange. We require evidence of your financial ability to undertake this contract.

Generally the above covers our requirements regarding exchange. You must recognize on deliberation that all these requirements are in keeping with sound business practice and constitute a protection or guarantee to each and every National Exchange. We will not promote weak exchanges; as the theory of our proposition merits the support of business men with capital sufficient to handle a proposition of this nature. We, therefore, insist from the outset, that our Exchanges buy a representative line of films so that they can in fact deliver a National programme. We require that the exhibitor be protected in what he contracts for—exclusive service, and therefore again it is necessary that we know that each and every exchange operating under the National banner is manned by men of responsibility and will appreciate the value of faithfully carrying the National programme into the field, for we know the quality will make good.

It is of the utmost importance to all concerned that the general elements of this proposition be thoroughly understood and it is not possible to detail it in letter. An exclusive franchise is a valuable asset. We are not asking you to do anything but satisfy us that you are financially able and morally suitable to represent the National service in territory. We believe that if you are in a position to satisfy these conditions that you cannot do better than visit us promptly and conclude negotiations.

Trusting that we may have your prompt decision as to what course you propose following, we are,

Yours for exclusive service,
NATIONAL FILM DISTRIBUTING CO.,

CONDITIONS IN CHICAGO

WE wonder if the manufacturers of film stories are fully aware of and if they realize the conditions existing in Chicago.

We were present the other day when the results of two independent manufacturers were rejected by the police board of Chicago and debarred from being exhibited in that city. The subjects were the "Travesty of a Religion," which naturally (taking the constitution of the board into consideration) would be rejected at once. The other was tending very largely toward the indecent film.

The Independents have such a vast field from which to select their scenarios, that we are surprised to find at this date a condition prevailing which will do much to hamper and clog the advancement of the trade at large. We have protested over and over again against any religious subjects being placed upon a film picture. There are sufficient subjects without bringing such an element of discord in. Again suggestion is being made, by, we believe, manufacturers not connected with either of the parties at present marketing films, who are anxiously desirous of bringing out a re-issue of the "James Boys" of Missouri, train wrecking, and the desecration of the home life. We sincerely trust that every exchange man will raise a voice of protest against such subjects being inflicted upon them, and if they do not, let the exhibitors lead, and issue a strong protest against such subjects being thrust upon them, and we will give all of the publicity they desire.

Surely out of some two thousand writers of film stories, the business can obtain good records and stories, meeting with the full approval of any censor board. Let us have the highest, the best, and the cleanest and not take a retrograde step, giving parsons and such like ilk another handle with which to rap the motion picture industry.

We would also like an answer to the query put to us by an exchange. What shall we do with these rejected reels?

Will the Sales Co. give an authoritative statement?

Not only is the police board a huge joke (although an unfortunate one), but the latest addenda is the limit, we extract from the Chicago Daily Journal of August 23rd:

Sergt. O'Connor, in Charge of Bureau, Decides Man Is Not Competent

The Chicago moving picture inspection bureau is to judge all the films presented to Chicago audiences "from a woman's point of view." This was decided to-day by Sergt. Jeremiah O'Connor, chief of the police bureau, whose supervision of moving pictures has won national fame, and he has selected Miss Emma Anderson, 3500 North Clark Street, to assist him.

So harmoniously does the bureau and the moving picture producers get along that a hint or suggestion from the Chicago police is looked upon as an order. This attitude of the producers is the result of the experience which has proved that outside cities will accept only such films as have passed Chicago inspection.

When Sergt. O'Connor took charge of the theater censorship a few months ago he said he would look at the pictures from the standpoint of childhood, and that any picture which would in the slightest degree injure the innocent fancies of the little ones would be barred.

Frequently perplexing problems arise and while the department passes upon most of the pictures quickly it has been found necessary to withhold judgment on some.

Experience has taught Sergt. O'Connor that few pictures are produced which may harm in any way the boy or girl of tender years.

"It is the youth and lass of 15 years up that worries me the most," said he. "Scenes and situations which in themselves are harmless sometimes have some little objectionable feature which might escape the vigilant eye of a man of the years of those in this bureau. Quicker observation and keener reception of the moods and fancies of persons of that age are necessary. For that reason I have asked Miss Anderson's assistance."

Miss Anderson's selection is due to the fact that she is one of the youngest stenographers in the city hall. She is employed in the election commissioner's office, and is still in her teens. She is of jovial and fun-loving disposition, and at the same time keenly appreciative of the indefinable line of demarcation between what is interesting and harmless fun, as distinguished from mere drivel and nonsense.

Films which should be judged, as Sergt. O'Connor puts it, "from the standpoint of a charming, vivacious Chicago girl," will be submitted for her approval.

OPERATORS—REJOICE?

AFTER long waiting, we have now got the full particulars regarding Alien Operators. It has been a pretty hard fight for the operators to obtain the position they are now in, but assisted by the News they have gained the victory. We left no stone unturned, appealing to the heads of all departments, even the President himself, whom we interested on behalf of the operators, whom it is now possible to advise, can obtain licenses to operate machines in New York State without serving the six months' apprenticeship, or without being banned as aliens.

UNIQUE POSTERS

On another page is an advertisement from the Goes Lithographing Company, of Chicago, who produced the eight-sheet poster used in the "Crusaders, or Jerusalem Delivered;" a remarkably fine specimen of lithographic work. We can heartily recommend the company to the people they appeal to.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

WE learn from an advertisement on another page that E. Mandelbaum, of Cleveland, has secured the Ohio State rights for the celebrated pictures of "The Crusaders, or Jerusalem Delivered." In addition to this, he is getting out a catalogue, listing all the educational films—up to date—we look forward to securing a copy when issued.

We also understand the company of which he is president is prepared to purchase negatives of an educational character.

A Word to the Wise

The following correspondence from the Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Company will speak for itself, and if impostors in their neighborhood are using the same methods we trust our readers will be cautioned in time and avoid the gentlemen whose names are mentioned therein.—Editor, M. P. N.

(Copy.)

Chicago, August 23, 1911.

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders, Editor,
Moving Picture News,
30 W. Thirteenth St.,
New York.

Dear Sir:

Under date of June 19th we received a telegram from Mr. Geo. H. Cox of Hays, Kansas, as follows:

Hays, Kans., June 19th.

"Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1100 Fisher Bldg., Chicago, Ills.

Do Warwick and Kane represent you in this territory. Bought Radium Screen from them. Answer by wire my expense.

GEO. H. COX.

and responded with the following telegram: "NO. IMPOSTORS IF CLAIMING TO REPRESENT US. WOULD LIKE FULL INFORMATION."

We then followed the matter up with correspondence explaining that if these people were representing themselves as agents of the "Sunlight" screen or were using the word "Sunlight" in connection with any screen that they were offering that they were impostors, as we had no representation in that part of the country.

We received the following letter in answer:

(Copy.)

Hays, Kans., June 21st, 1911.

"Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
Chicago, Ills.

Gentlemen:

Replying to your telegram and letter of the 19th, Messrs. Kane and Warwick were in Ellis, Hays and Russell that I know of and sold curtains for you to Kuhn & Overstreet of Ellis and to myself, but under the name of The Radium Screen Co.

They had a long strip on which they demonstrated and the curtain was truly wonderful. They pointed out your advertisement in the ———— as the company they represented, and they carried papers of various kinds which appeared O. K.

Mr. Warwick did the demonstrating and most of the talking. He is about forty-five years old, of a sandy complexion, reddish-brown curly hair, wears glasses and is about five foot eleven tall. Weight about 175 pounds.

Mr. Robert T. Kane is of a slighter build, light complexioned, blue eyes, hair a light black and straight. Age about thirty-five.

Each is a good talker and good entertainer.

For further information I would refer you to Kuhn & Overstreet of Ellis, Kansas.

If I can be of any assistance in catching these men I'll do what I can.

Yours very truly,

GEO. H. COX.

We subsequently heard from various exhibitors in Kansas and from other sources learning that these people were offering the so-called Radium Screen and claiming that it was a "Sunlight" curtain.

The enclosed copy of letter from Mr. Cox will explain the situation with regard to his particular case.

We have advice from exhibitors that in some instances they had purchased curtains which were not delivered and that letters to these parties at their Denver address met with no response.

Other exhibitors claimed that these parties had solicited business and had called attention to our "Sunlight" ad in the ———— claiming that their curtain was the one advertised.

In another instance we had a gentleman call upon us at our Chicago office claiming that a man by the name of Robert T. Kane, which name had been used in previous information that had reached us, had made an appointment with him at this office claiming that it was the office of the Radium Screen Company and asked him to meet him here to discuss the question of hiring him as a salesman.

This concern, The Radium Screen Company, claim a Chicago office but investigation shows that as far as can be learned they never had one and they are not known to the moving picture interests here in Chicago.

We have information from the General Film Company of Denver, Colorado, that they have no knowledge of the Company's office at Denver and did not know their address there.

We are receiving communications in every mail from Kansas, Nebraska and elsewhere from exhibitors that have evidently been imposed upon as they have been led to believe that they were buying our screens.

One customer claims to have bought a second hand screen which was not satisfactory because he could not get the wrinkles out of it and attempted to order one of our patented frames to correct it. As he could not possibly have purchased a "Sunlight" screen we assume he had been imposed upon. Our screens are never sold except in connection with our patented frame.

We think it to the interest of the trade and for the protection of exhibitors to expose the methods of these people. We have made persistent inquiry of the people that have written us in connection with this matter to ascertain where they claimed that their factory was located and to locate them as a business concern, but we have failed absolutely to get that information.

If you give this matter publicity in your Journal, we will appreciate it if any exhibitor who can give us any further information or who has any evidence to show that anyone has used our copyrighted word "Sunlight" in connection with curtains would notify us immediately.

The letterhead that this concern uses in correspondence bears no permanent address.

Yours very truly,

"SUNLIGHT" METALLIC CLOTH CURTAIN CO.,
A. W. Wylie, Pres't.

"3-Sheets" and Booklets with "Romeo and Juliet"

In addition to the extra lobby display matter on "Romeo and Juliet" Thanhouser Company have been offering exhibitors gratis, they announce that both three-sheet posters and special booklets for theater distribution are now available to exhibitors who wish to spend a little money in featuring the picture. This makes "Romeo and Juliet" the first film issued as a regular release on a manufacturer's regular release day, to be honored with a three-sheet poster, or indeed anything over the size of a one-sheet. The departure, since it is made in behalf of a Shakespearian production, a "classic" would seem to prove that the best classes of people are being drawn to the moving pictures.

MOVING PICTURES

By Flo Field

In New Orleans Times-Democrat

The anniversary is at hand, a few days this way or that, of the first moving picture exhibit in New Orleans. Fifteen years ago out at West End a curious, wondering, half incredulous crowd gathered to see the incredible display of living, moving pictures, produced by the fifth machine in the United States that was the product of Edison's genius.

It is an anniversary that will cause no stir; in fact, it will be scarcely remembered by even the few who worked like Trojans with the difficulty of an inadequate outfit and inefficient apparatus such as would stagger the operator of to-day, who has nothing to do but turn a crank. By the great gaping public who looked and looked and could scarcely believe their own eyes, it has dropped into oblivion with other anniversaries of the same kind, continuing to prove what a big child that public is, forgetting constantly when its benefits began, only asking for more and newer playthings. And yet but a touch is needed to make the child remember, and remember vividly, as children do, that evening of grown-up fairy tale, when the impossible—the thing that couldn't—happened! The slow slipping bayou, the great, soft-shadowy lake, the snakey mystery of swamp with its ragged, dim outline of moss-hung trees against the sapphire night sky, the old puzzle gardens and "maze" and "lover's lane," fragrant with roses and sweet olive, fall faintly on the mind's screen as a mystic frame for that sharp, dazzling square out on the great platform in which pictures came true.

Fifteen years ago! And one has seen and forgotten enough moving pictures to wrap around the equator, but the marvels of those first forty-foot films lingers yet. There was the Cissy Fitzgerald picture, that wink that was so famous, and the May Irwin kiss picture, and one can still see the more astounding view of the New York Elevated Railroad and the rushing trains of a station scene. One felt, one recollects, that one was in imminent danger of being run over. The morning paper next day commented upon the "realistic manner" in which the "steam, smoke, etc., was presented!"

We do not, primarily, take our pleasures sadly in the South. We get all the magic that is in them. You will recall it was so when we finally were invaded by electric cars. We came in droves from the side streets to watch them go by; our friends, fortunate enough to live on "the avenue," held front gallery levees, sort of all-day box parties, to witness the performance of street cars flying by without apparently head nor tail to 'em! We welcomed them with a fearful enthusiasm, and not a few of us also opposed them with the sneaking belief that they were "demon-haunted." The first four-horse coach in the city was a stock circus to us, and the coaching parties which the wealthy, progressive owner gave once in a while, caused about as much thrill as the passing of the band wagon, nor did we miss the band when the footman blew his fabulous trumpet. The first automobiles, the first phonographs, the first piano players, they all found us unprepared, pristine in our appreciation, unspoiled in our delight by the sophistication that robs.

The moving picture descended upon us as the spangled parachute jumper did upon old Uncle Ebeon in the cornfield. As the one seemed heaven-sent, so the picture appeared to us nothing if not actual. Why, some of us thought they were sure enough people! and when a stunt was finished we often caught ourselves applauding the performer.

One remembers, in particular, one picture of a beautiful lady acrobat, who was shown in a trapeze act, and as she suspended herself by one hand and straightened her body out at right angles Jim, who was one's best beau at the time and keen on sports and appreciative to the last degree, burst into tumultuous clapping and was so revealed to the breathless audience as the lights went up. As the crowd realized Jim's naivette and its own narrow escape, it gave vent to a great-crowd laugh and bent its good-natured banter upon Jim's chagrin and one's flaming mortification. It all seemed reason enough then for a stormy parting.

It was, as has been said, a primitive equipment as compared with the outfits of to-day. The machine itself weighed between 250 and 300 pounds, whereas now the weight is scarcely over 75 pounds. It was of the spool bank type, run by a one-eighth horse power motor, and, considering the skill and general experience required, it is not surprising that the operators commanded salaries of $50 and $75 a week. In the little white room which was the operator's box at West End was "Bill Reid," one of the oldest, ablest operators in the picture business, and to whom we promptly gave the picturesque title of "Sir William Vitagraph." That hat box in which he worked possessed fascinations. We regarded it as something between a jewel casket and a jack-in-the-box. We applied, five hundred a night, to get inside and see what happened. Sometimes he let a celebrity up. Lesser applicants never knew what was seen; all that the celebrity ever explained was that it was the hottest place he'd ever been in or hoped to be in! And in a temperature that so beggared description the operator looked after electricity, motor and film. Off in an outbuilding, on his knees, another enthusiast in the business pumped away at the gasoline engine that supplied power to the operator. The pictures lasted twenty minutes. Crowds of 12,000 and more flocked out on the old dummy trains, trooped over the slow, slipping bayou to sit spellbound for those twenty magic minutes, and wotted nothing that it was so prosaically accomplished, one man on his knees pumping a motor, the other in a dripping shirt manipulating the awkward possibilities of light and film of a machine that had no shutter betwen the film and the lens.

But now the wonder is worn away, and with the wonder the happy curiosity over the cause. We accept anything on the moving picture screen and not only never give even an idle thought to the operator's box and its mysteries, but look upon the most thrilling play, the most dangerous situation and wonderful scenery, and never ask how it is all done. Fifteen years ago, when we were in such excitement over forty-foot films, the newspapers prophesied that they would reach a length of 2,000 feet. The reproduction of the Passion Play requires a 5,000-foot film, and the improvements that have taken place in this span of time are on the same scale of comparisons. New Orleans was the first city in the world to have a ten-cent moving picture show, the "Vitascope," as it was called, at 623 Canal street. Now every small town in the Union that has electric lights has a picture house. There are about 600 moving picture houses in New York; Los Angeles has more; Chicago has over a thousand, and the manufacturers in the business are too numerous to mention. The business as a whole has reached almost immeasurable proportions. The large picture companies have the most magnificent studios and their own stock companies constantly in rehearsal and acting before the camera. In the production of a picture no expense is spared. Recently to perform a picture play, "The Trapper's Daughter," the Vitagraph Company sent their stock company of actors to Alaska to get the proper setting. Another company, the Kalem Company, has just sent a troupe to Ireland for the real scenic background.

The charm and value of such artistic performances is great and far-reaching, and the influence lies within the power of these big amusement corporations beyond words. The moving picture show is now our chief public habit. It is the nightly entertainment of millions who choose it for their recreation; it is the daily influence of countless children whose mothers send them, frequently alone. Into the young, the idle, the impressionable minds daily is poured the tremendous impression of the pictured thing, an influence that has come to take the place of spoken word, if spoken word were ever more impressive than the picture. It is not too much to say that at present there seems far too little appreciation of this influence, far too little thought of the moral result. To the child mind the moving picture is all real. He looks at it as Alice looked into the mirror, and thinks he is looking into another room of life. Those are real deaths, real horrors, real murders, real thefts and battles that take place before his eyes, and while the heroic note always pervades, as it does in melodrama, the moving picture story usually depends upon a lingering and very accented villainy. It is questionable whether the sensational picture is the proper food for the young American public mind, so saturated with the sense of it already; whether it is the right food for the young American mind that has turned from the brothers Grimm and Hans Andersen to this.

I, for one, would make my plea for the higher uses of this vast possibility that may be the vehicle of industry, advertising beauty or terror, heroic ambition or flagrant degeneracy.

Pictures that portray profligacy, unfaithfulness and suggestive pleasures are assuredly not the mental food for the future men and women who are to be the people of a strong nation into which is constantly pouring the unmanageable tides of alien nationalities.

In the old countries things that are not fit for children to see, children do not see, because it is not customary to take them.

In this country the child is free to see anything and if mothers and fathers do not provide a home censorship, it behooves the State to offer a strict one.

For it is not as if the hackneyed horrors of Wild West stories and slum melodramas were the only fields open to the moving picture plot—there is all of history, the broad, richly jeweled romances; there is all of poetry and folklore and mythology and fairyland to draw from, such wide, starry fields as will fill the public mind with precious stores than can be given in no other way, that will educate while it amuses and pleases.

A slight story and any amount of instructive knowledge can be pictured into the open mind!

A little care and all of the influences of the "movey," as the kiddies call it, will be helpful and uplifting and advancing!

If we thought, fifteen years ago, that the picture which ran a few moments, with such a trying lot of blink to it, too, was marvelous, what would we have thought of the lengthy stories now thrown on the canvas in natural colors! The coming of the Kinemacolor machine in a way gives a fresh impetus to the moving picture, going beyond the dreams of those who have longed for great volume of color in pictures. Colored pictures have been done heretofore by hand, the work of Miss Martine of New York and the stencil coloring of Pathe Freres of Paris being particularly noteworthy. The Kinemacolor machine does the work instantaneously; so heavy that it needs a motor power to run it, it moves films at twice the ordinary speed, as it requires the exposure of two pictures to make one complete exposure, one of these being shown through the red color screen and the other through the green, the two blending together and forming the complete reproduction of natural colors. The result is a delicacy and loveliness of coloring exceedingly delightful.

With this bursting of the picture, this flowering of it into fair, lifelike color, the last bond, be it remembered, that holds it as an unreal thing will part in the child mind. To the child whatever has color—lives! Let us see to it that the picture story possesses that element of beauty which deserves life.

ONE WAY TO POPULARIZE MOTION PICTURE SHOWS

A very successful, if not entirely original way of attracting audiences and bringing steady business to his moving picture place in Melbourne, Australia, is being tried by T. J. West, of that city, a very liberal advertiser in the daily newspapers of the Australian metropolis. Mr. West offers each week a cash prize of five guineas (about $26) to the boy or girl who writes and sends in to him the best essay upon any particular show of the week that he selects—usually the most important and most popular of the films displayed in the theater during that particular week. It is stipulated in the ad that each and every contestant must be a school attender and a certificate to that effect must accompany each compotition. In this way Mr. West has hit upon a sure way of interesting the young folks in his weekly offerings, as it is obvious that all contestants must first visit the theater and witness the play that he, or she, has to write the essay upon.

It is reasonably certain, too, that the parents or guardians of each competing child will be sufficiently interested in the efforts of the children, and the presentations upon which these efforts are to be founded—to pay the admission fee and witness the show—so Mr. West virtually kills two birds with one stone and greatly increases the normal attendance at the theater. But he has still another magnet for the grown-ups.

Once a month Mr. West offers a prize of twenty-five guineas ($131) for the best scenario or drama of Australian life, in which the qualities demanded are:

1—Sensational Situations.
2—Photographic Possibilities.
3—Dramatic Intensity.
4—Attractive Title.

The scenarios are judged by three dramatic experts who are paid by Mr. West as adjudicators. The plan is honestly conducted and has awakened considerable interest, besides drawing out considerable latent talent among amateur writers and dramatists in the Antipodes.

As this scheme of Mr. West's has for some time been continuous, it is reasonably sure that it is paying him. It is easy to imagine, too, that successive prize-winners become lifelong friends of that particular show and all the time boost it among their friends and acquaintances. Something on a similar line ought to pay here in this country, where, as a rule, better prices are charged for admission than rule in Australia. Over there a child is charged at matinees 12 cents to all parts of the house, except the orchestra, which is just double. Fifty cents of our money is the admission price for an adult to the better seats. There are, however, but two shows a day—at 2:30 and 8 p.m. The continuous "stay-as-long-as-you-please" brand of show is not yet popular in Australia.

However, judging from the advertising pages of the "Melbourne Argus," there is plenty of competition in the motion picture business in Australia, though the subjects shown are not so varied as in America, nor so brief in plot and presentation.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

(Contributed by Benny, Office Boy of The National Waterproof Film Company)

Conceived was I in scenario,
But my birth occurred in studio,
Thus giving me both artistic bent
And literary temperament.

I'd a thousand feet with which to run,
But of arms, or hands, I hadn't one.
My beauty was of such great extent,
All marveled at my development.

Fated for exchange subjection,
And worse, their very poor inspection,
My face soon scratched and marred with dirt,
And beauty fled, as in a spurt.

Unwaterproofed, unwashed, unclean,
I grew unfitted to be seen.
Exhibitors all were sore at me,
The public, they all swore at me.

Oily and marred, with joints all parted,
I wondered why I was ever started.
To end this tale, this exegesis,
An operator shot me to pieces.

THE YANKEE FILM COMPANY

With The Yankee Film Company. What "Big Bill" and "Little Bernie" Are Doing

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

PRIVATE OFFICE OF MR. STEINER AND MR. BERNSTEIN

POSTER ROOM OF YANKEE FILM COMPANY

I took a trip to the den of these two invulnerable Yankees not so very long ago. I found "Little Bernie" busy in the clipping and cementing room, filling the place of one of the men who was absent. I perched myself complacently on one of the big high stools at his side, my heels finding a resting place on one of the round rungs midway between the seat and the floor, awaiting his pleasure and convenience to show me what was doing in and around the plant.

"BILL" STEINER, PRESIDENT OF YANKEE FILM CO.

As I still sat in my elevated position, enveloped in my newspaper dignity (?), along came "Big Bill Steiner," towering above ordinary humans like me, in his blonde seriousness. He shook hands with me, said he was glad to see me, and therewith made good his escape. "Bill" doesn't like to be interviewed, so when he can he steers clear of us newspaper folk, while "Bernie," small but mighty, stands up and does the honors for the firm in right manly style. However, some day I shall "beard the lion in his den"—when the sentinel is sleeping I shall come upon the lair of his majesty, and he shall give to me the interview which I shall request.

Jokes aside, I want to tell you something of my impressions of the "Yankee" and its work. The Yankee Film Co. is an all-alive firm, a firm which is making an ascent very rapidly. Through the dove-tailing of the ideas of the two principal members of the company, Mr. William Steiner, president, and Mr. Isadore Bernstein, his assistant, some very excellent work is being done.

At the present time the "Yankee" employs three distinct stock companies, and three directors, each making a specialty of a certain line of work, and all being thoroughly competent. I was very much impressed with the careful attention paid to the dressing rooms at their studio, 344 East 32d street. They are clean, nicely equipped and roomy. Quantities of costumes, elaborate and otherwise are kept in connection with the studio. In the property room can be found anything from a child's toy drum upward. In the studio are stacks and stacks of scenes of different kinds, painted by their own scenic artist. The plant is very complete and is equipped for the best work, having a capacity for turning out 150,000 feet of film per week.

It is not, however, so much of the "Yankee" plant that I wish to speak, for as in all other moving picture plants there are the usual individual quarters allotted to each portion of the work of preparing the film for the market. After the organizing and capitalizing of a moving picture film company there must be a place found for the development of the idea after its conception, and for the reproduction of the developed idea, which place centralizes in the so-called moving picture plant. Then there must be attendants to aid in the development of the said idea, which we will individualize as stock company and director. But before any work can be done by any of the aforesaid institutions there must be conceived not one idea only, but hundreds and thousands of ideas following in the wake of each other. And again before there is any attempt made at the conception of an idea, the quality and kind that that idea is going to be must be decided upon.

It is to the quality and kind of ideas conceived and developed by the Yankee Film Co. that I want to draw my readers' attention. Without a beginning there can be no end. Without an ideal that is constantly shifting itself in advance of the pursuer, there can be no high altitude attained in the atmosphere of progression. It has been my impression through what I have gathered in conversation with the firm, and observation of work done, that the Yankee Film Co. has its ideal set in the stars, and that there will be ere long some startling developments along moving picture lines come from their studio.

"WOMAN"

"INSHAVOGUE"

"FOR THE WEARING OF THE GREEN"

The Yankee Film Co. is as yet in its infancy, having had but two years' travel on the stoney road to success, but in that time the gigantic baby has made marvelous strides along the way of progression. It is a very creditable fact that Mr. Steiner and Mr. Bernstein have been for some time endeavoring to institute a reform in the way of partially eliminating the irksome quality of melodrama from the moving picture, by intensifying and dignifying the human interest of the story, and by accentuating its moral. The public has long since grown tired of melodrama, and the Yankee film people have gotten "wise" to the fact. To eliminate melodrama entirely with one fell swoop would be as unwise as to plunge an overheated body into an ice cold bath—dire disaster might ensue. "Slow but sure" is the best motto to adopt—all great movements progress slowly.

A unique innovation is being followed out by them in the way of weaving stories around familiar quotations from great authors. Prominent magazine writers who have specialized on a certain class of stories have been employed by the

I. BERNSTEIN, "BERNIE," THE SMALL ASSISTANT OF "BIG BILL"

Yankee Film Co. to weave stories around such quotations as the following: "What disaster could she bring upon thy house, who is a woman," from Longfellow, around which the story entitled "Woman" is written, and "Know then thy self, presume not God to scan; the proper study of mankind is man," from Pope, the picture to be a companion one to "Woman" and entitled "Man." The former is a story of the inconsistencies of woman, and the latter a story founded on the reincarnation theory, and is a plea for the proper mental and physical development of man. The opening scene of the latter picture is in the stone age, showing man in an undeveloped state of intelligence, seeking to satisfy all his wants, and gratify all his desires by the use of physical force—the animal instinct uppermost, and wantonly killing his kind in his struggle to hold his possessions, or to gain his desires. The reincarnation scene of the second part of the picture is illustrative of the change from the animal instinct of our savage ancestors for the purpose of regeneration, to the more intelligent passion of the present age, and which we call love. Also it is illustrative of man's changed attitude toward woman since the days of our savage progenitors; the picture will also be deeply suggestive of the evolution of woman since the prehistoric ages, as well as accentuating the need for the proper physical and mental development of man.

The Yankee Film Co. has worked out a number of Irish stories, some of which have already been given to the public, and some of which are still in embryo form. "Kathleen Mavourneen" and "Colleen Bawn" are now before the public, and "Inshavogue" and "For the Wearing of the Green" are still to follow. These films are of remarkable excellence, the exterior scenes of which were taken across the waters on the "Emerald Isle." I will not give a detailed account of any of these pictures at this writing. In later issues of the News detailed accounts will appear from time to time, so as to keep our readers in touch with the work of our "Yankee" friends.

The heads of the firm of the "Yankee" are blessed with a limitless supply of that most requisite quality of success, enthusiasm. Careful and systematic work backed by this enthusiasm cannot fail to lead speedily to the attaining of an ideal. The Yankee Film Co. has commenced a precedent which all well-meaning exhibitors must of a certainty support, that of producing at regular intervals of probably a month apart educational films. It takes a great deal of courage to attempt to buck other large companies with such a precedent—the risk of loss is ever a menace. But the "Yankee" are equal to the occasion—they are "taking the bull by the horns." A failure to arrive at the appointed goal could only ensue through the tardiness of the exhibitors to fall in line with the progressive step which the "Yankees" have taken.

THE ST. LOUIS MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

Another Independent Recruit

The St. Louis Motion Picture Company, manufacturing Shamrock film, is the latest addition to the Independent ranks.

This company is incorporated under the laws of the state of Missouri, and is being financed by persons of wealth and influence in the business community of St. Louis. Its policy will be dramatic and industrial work.

The plant is completed and equipped with every modern device for the manufacture of motion pictures.

An efficient stock company of experienced motion picture players has been engaged, and the first dramatic release will shortly be announced.

Mr. G. P. Hamilton, late of the Essanay and American companies, who has been identified with the motion picture industry of this country since its inception, has been engaged as manager of production.

Mr. Hamilton's ability as an organizer is too well known to require comment.

ORTHO FILM CO.

Re-developing and Cleaning Process

Exhibitors and exchange men should investigate this process as demonstrated by the Ortho Film Co., of 40 East Twelfth street, New York City.

Exhibitors should protect their patrons and see that films displayed on the screen are perfect in every respect and free from flicker and rain; defects from this source tend to mar the enjoyment of the entertainment as well as having a bad effect on the eyes. The Ortho Company claim to remedy this defect, which is the Hochstetter process, and the latest invention. They will demonstrate this before the Board of Health and will be pleased to give all interested a proof of all they claim for the process. Exhibitors and exchange men are invited to call at their office.

CHARLEY'S BUTTE—CHAMPION FILM CO. RELEASE OF SEPTEMBER 11

AN OPINION FROM A PROMINENT LIBRETTIST, MR. GEO. D. BAKER, WHO DRAMATIZED THE NEW AND SUCCESSFUL PLAY, "THE GOOSE GIRL"

By Margaret I. MacDonald

IT was at one of the most successful first nights ever witnessed in the state that I met and conversed with the actor-author, Mr. Geo. D. Baker. "The Goose Girl" was having its initial performance at the Lyceum, Paterson, N. J.

Behind the scenes at about 7.20 P. M. everything was in a mad rush and whirl of excited anticipation; and although everything was in its proper place, ready to slide into position at the appointed time, yet there was that ever-present anxiety, attendant on first nights, to have things just right. Mr. Baker was directing the setting of the opening scene with coatless enthusiasm. That he was able to greet us in this supreme moment of anxiety, as he did, with outstretched hands, and words of hearty welcome, was a marvel—a suggestion of the enthusiasm that has backed up so many of the productions of the firm of Baker & Castle.

There was an atmosphere of confidence about the place, such as is begotten of a consciousness of being well prepared. With the eager spontaneity of a boy of fourteen, Mr. Baker displayed the charms and versatility of the huge throne chair, upon which he himself had done the upholstering of rich cardinal plush. In the dressing rooms actors and actresses bedecked themselves in the light of a faith that believed in their competency to exploit with vivid realism the roles entrusted to their individual efforts—a faith whose wisdom and accuracy of judgment acclaimed itself in the thunder of applause with which each feat of acting and masterly interpretation was met.

The clever book of Harold McGrath has lost nothing in its dramatization by Mr. Baker. It may even be said that it has gained somewhat, for the spontaneous humor and ready wit of the librettist has added a sparkle and color which make the stage production most pleasing in effect. Comedy intermingled with drama, gorgeousness with simplicity, and an excellent moral tone maintained throughout characterize the play. The cast had been wisely chosen and evenly balanced—there was a finished art and an intelligent conception displayed in each individual effort.

Before coming to the real point of my story, I feel I must dwell for a moment on a few of the unusual virtues of the firm of Baker & Castle. These two men have risen and pushed their way to the front through deserving talent and honest effort to do well the tasks with which life has obligated them, and in dealing kindly, squarely, and honestly by all who happened under their jurisdiction. Mr. Castle is a small man who undertakes tremendous tasks. The stage management, the choice of advance men, advance press notices, the booking of dates ahead, the arrangement of the music to suit the light and shade of individual plays, all of these and more fall to his lot to manipulate. And it has been told to me on good authority that the fear of young women actresses with regard to moral obligations is entirely obliterated when under the supervision of the firm of Baker & Castle. It is a deplorable fact that to enter the profession successfully and still keep her virgin purity is almost an absolute impossibility for the girl on the stage. And it is a great pleasure for me to be able to say that I am personally acquainted with a firm whose record shows a clean sheet, and whose object is art and not immorality. The proudest compliment that I can pay to the firm of Baker & Castle is to say that to work for them is to be protected. In their office here is always the assurance of a pleasant reception and a patient hearing. If your case deserves attention, and it is within the power of the firm to help you, you can rest assured that you will not be turned away without something that is helpful, be it only a word of encouragement.

As I stood talking to Mr. Baker, and while he still kept an eye on the arranging of the exquisite scenery which is carried by the company, the conversation turned most opportunely to the subject of moving pictures. The librettist at once became enthusiastic, and his sonorous voice rang out in most convincing tones, as he elaborated on the values of the moving picture as an entertainer and educator.

"Oh, the moving picture is a wonderful thing!—Wonderful! Why, have you seen those pictures in natural colors at the Herald Square? The most marvelous thing I have ever seen!"

"Why, I tell you the moving picture is going to put us actors out of business—at least, the time will come when there will be practically no use for us in the capacity in which we now work. There'll be plenty of work for the actor, but it will be with the moving picture producer. Why, when they get this phonographic business going—when they take the great dramas with costumes, stage settings, everything brought out in natural colors, I tell you there's going to be something doing, believe me."

I felt that Mr. Baker voiced the opinion of many other prominent men of the profession—in fact, the opinion of the most intelligent people throughout the world. The day is most assuredly coming when the moving picture will displace almost every other kind of theatrical entertainment. The best actors and actresses will be engaged by the producers to enact the finest works of dramatized literature. In the West already there are a number of schools that have installed the moving picture in their class rooms for the purpose of using them in connection with the lessons.

MR. W. A. DANIELS, OF THE NATIONAL WATERPROOF FILM CO.

During the past week Mr. Daniels was making a business trip to New York, and we thought it very opportune to get in touch with him and ask his views regarding the industry of which he is the indefatigable head. We want to get our readers well versed in the methods and principles adopted by Mr. Daniels' firm for the preservation of new film as well as the renovating and improvement of old. We have on our desk a sample of scratched film and the results after treatment by the N. W. F. Co. Leaving the floor to Mr. Daniels to give his views, he now states:

Nothing can be kept clean unless it is occasionally washed. The moving picture film perhaps needs washing more than anything else, that is, it is easily injured by dirt, which should be removed. Water is the best solvent for dirt, and our process puts a film in a condition by which it may be systematically washed with soap and water. We claim that all films should be washable, and further than that, should be washed, and when this is universally done, spots and rainy lines on second and third reels or any others will be matters of the past. The waterproof compound is practically celluloid, so that a film waterproofed by us is protected on both sides by celluloid. The gelatine emulsion in which the photographs are developed are therefore like a meat sandwich.

During the course of conversation Mr. Daniels showed us an innovation which we think ought to be in the possession of every film exchange throughout the country and which we can more than recommend from our knowledge of chemistry, and the properties inside are the best. It does what the trade has been trying to discover for a long while, that is, a brittle film which breaks immediately it is put on the machine is made supple and pliant so that its sprocket holes may be kept intact, and lengthens the life of a film very considerably.

We understand a patent has been applied for and Mr. Daniels will be pleased to supply the trade with further particulars. We think for every film in an exchange there should be a box, and immediately on the return from the exhibitor it should be placed in this box. We believe the action is complete in about twelve hours.

Mr. Clark, of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Co., Chicago, Ill., is visiting New York and the Eastern cities in the interests of the Motiograph. Mr. Clark is making his headquarters while in New York with the H. A. Mackie Co., of 853 Broadway. At the present writing Mr. Clark is in Boston.

Mr. W. E. Smith, the general sales manager of the H. A. Mackie, Inc., 853 Broadway, has just returned from a business trip through Western New York and the New England States, having visited Boston and other large cities. He reports a large increase in sales for his company.

The offices of the company have been enlarged and they are carrying all of the leading makes of projecting machines and supplies. Mr. Smith is leaving for a trip through the Southern States, and he looks for big results, for when Mr. Smith makes his appearance his baneful influence is surely felt and the exhibitor just—buys.

REFLECTIONS OF A GALLERY GOD

By A. L. Barrett

It's well enough for those with cash to talk of the theater play,
But when you haven't much of that and are tired at the end of the day,
And don't know what to do with yourself and don't know where to go,
Why, then's the time for rest, I think.—and to see a fine picture show.

It doesn't cost but a nickel or dime, and it's just the grandest fun,
For you see everything that can happen, from dawn to the setting sun;
In love, war or comedy,—industries, too, from England to far Cathay,
Or life in your own home city, it's all one to the picture play.

When I was a kid it was different, and before the clock struck seven
We'd all be lined up on the sidewalk for the first chance in nigger heaven,
Where some wooden forms awaited us, with surroundings coarse and uncouth,
And the odor of beer and of garlic was enough to blow off the roof.

But when we got there, we couldn't see plain, though it cost us a quarter straight,
And we'd miss just so much of the play, of course, if we worked overtime or were late;
And sometimes they all got excited and would yell and then stamp on the floor,
And we couldn't hear what the actors said with such a racket and roar.

But now when I go to the picture play, why any old time will do,
And I simply lean back in my easy chair till all of the plays get through;
And the ushers all show me the very best seats, just the same as they do the rest,
For I am no longer a gallery god, but as good as the handsomest dressed.

Yes, since I was a kid, we've got all sorts of wonders,
Eighty-mile an hour trains and four-day ocean liners,
Airships, telegraphs, telephones, phonographs, wireless,
And last, but not least, the picture play tireless.

THE MOTHER GOOSE NURSERY RHYMES

The Imp Company has a rare treat in store for the children in a film that will be released Monday, September 11th, under the title of "By the House That Jack Built." It is a fairy story based on the mythical stories of the melodies of Mother Goose, little tales that have interested children for years. The characters will be recognized immediately they appear on the screen and it goes without saying that the juveniles will be delighted. Their elders will also be interested, for the scenes will recall pleasant memories of hours beguiled in reading the little tales There is a pretty love story incorporated in the film, that of a bond girl who is taken by the kind old lady of Banbury Cross on her white horse to the fairy realm and eventually marries the prince, the son of Old King Cole. The play is elegantly and correctly costumed and the ensembles are large and dazzling. Nearly all the familiar characters are introduced, including the house that Jack built, the cow with the crumpled horn, and other familiar types and settings to make the story conform to the tales as told in the well-remembered nursery rhymes. Several of the scenes are elaborate, including Little Bo Peep and her sheep, the marriage of the prince and the poor girl, the four and twenty blackbirds baked into a pie and the banishing of Taffy and the wicked queen.

I AM THE THEATER CHAIR

I am the Theater Chair, born of the mother earth.

Ore from Superior mountains transported in ships that throb in telling greatness of the mechanical skill of man. Twice refined and moulded is my frame-work, strong and true.

Wood cut to human flesh thickness, cross-glued to give it strength; formed, then polished and rubbed and colored, coated with transparent luster is the beauty of my form and flesh.

I exist to serve a purpose. Humanity is dear to me. I hold in my lap the loved ones of all ages, sex, and kind. I make them comfortable while they enjoy that production of science, the moving picture, marvelous in inventive genius, beauty, art and education.

This is not all I do for my loved ones, for, in the sphere in which I live, I am the Apostle of Goodness and Greatness.

I believe in sanitary conditions, so I have not bedecked my body with ornaments to catch dust and dirt and germs. Neither do I sprawl on the floor like a kitten, but stand erect on a plain pedestal base, under which can not collect vile vermin, the sight of which disgusts; ask women.

I am the personification of politeness, for when not serving a purpose I am always up and out of the way. I will turn round to let you pass by me and return to my proper place without a word or murmur.

I have saved the lives of thousands by my prompt and skillful actions. My beloved ones, who are the Public, know how dependable I am, for they realize how, when excited, they become fools, or like beasts of prey, and to know that I will not obstruct their passage to safety makes them love me, oh, yes! dearly!

Believe me, and try me.

I Am the Theater Chair.

The Hardesty Manufacturing Company of Canal Dover, Ohio, is offering a prize of $25 to any exhibitor who can submit to them a better idea than the above prose poem on the Theater Chair. Now is the chance for you to show your ingenuity in framing up some good suggestion to put forth the merits of their celebrated automatic folding and revolving opera chairs.

MUTT AND JEFF AND THE GERMAN BAND (NESTOR)

When we first heard of Mutt and Jeff's venture in motion pictures, we were rather inclined to pooh-pooh the idea. The slapstick humor does not appeal to us, and we figured that the public was already groaning under the crushing weight of so-called comedies. We journeyed forth to witness one of the earliest Nestor productions featuring the jolly cartoon comedians, Mutt and Jeff, and were agreeably disappointed. Where we expected to find horse-play, rough and tumble, far-fetched fun, we found clean, natural and responsive humor. There was no straining after effect, no crude buffoonery; if anything, we thought the comedy too dignified for such grotesque characters as Mutt and Jeff. We returned to our editorial sanctum in a delighted and doubtful state of mind. Delighted because our worst fears had not materialized, and doubtful because we could not conjecture how the great army of motion picture lovers would take the Mutt and Jeff stunt.

Since then there has been no question to the continuous success of this brand of Nestor comedies. The public has been quick to appreciate this company's efforts, and to-day Mutt and Jeff pictures are sought for everywhere.

At first there existed a little misunderstanding as to the talking innovation in this film, and for the benefit of some readers who have not yet had the pleasure of seeing the Mutt and Jeff comedies, we will clarify the matter by stating that the characters' conversation is not heard; it is seen, however, as the spoken words appear on the screen simultaneously with the action. This invention is due to Mr. David Horsley, by whom it has been patented.

As was to be expected, the Mutt and Jeff farces have shown a steady and marked improvement, and the latest releases are well-nigh flawless. Where once the work seemed ragged and crude, now it is even and finished. The scenarios are full of meaty humor; the actors begin to look and to act the parts; the director knows how to make every point tell and is evidently master of the situation.

We have just seen "Mutt and Jeff and the German Band," which will be released Saturday, Sept. 2, and, though the theater atmosphere was lacking, we actually laughed all throughout the running of this film. (By the way, we do not laugh very readily). A number of other competent judges of motion pictures were present. Laugh? No; theirs was a volcanic eruption of Ha-Ha-Has! When we were able to talk, we exchanged notes, and "Mutt and Jeff and the German Band" was unanimously voted the funniest of the series.

The story deals—no, there is no story attached to this or any other Mutt and Jeff picture—it's just an incident, but one of those incidents worth a dozen stories. It depicts a phase in the topsy-turvy life of these luckless devils created by that king of cartoonists, "Bud" Fisher. Mutt and Jeff are not looking for adventures; they are content with the more prosaic occupation of hunting for the almighty dollar. A German band of the usual ill-assorted variety appears to make money with the aid of a little "blow." A suspicious looking blind fellow grinds out agony after agony on an antique box-organ and "gets the dough." A golden vista suddenly opens before the hungry gaze of Mutt and Jeff. They become troubadors, or rather, Jeff shoulders the big brass horn, while Mutt slides to first base with a sliding trombone. Instead of a shower of small coin, they are made a target for broken bric-a-brac and breaking brick-bats. The end comes amid a pandemonium of laughter.

P. S.—We hear that David Horsley is personally putting on the Mutt and Jeff farces. If the rumor is true, we take off our hats to him as being one of the best comedy directors in the business.

KINEMACOLOR—HERALD SQUARE THEATER

During the coming week, the Kinemacolor Company will exhibit two Kinemacolors of special interest to New Yorkers.

The first will be a flower study, entitled "Floral Friends," in which the products of nature, in the "Floral Kingdom" will be exhausted—sixteen studies are shown, including Nasturtiums, Heath, Scarlet Windflowers, Fuchsias, Dahlias, Cornflowers, Pansies, Mimosa, Chrysanthemums, Poppies, Tiger Lilies, Tulips, Carnations, Lilies of the Valley and Roses, showing the accurate reproduction of all the gradation of colors with wonderful effects.

This picture is shown at this time to silence all criticism regarding Kinemacolor—in this picture every color of the spectrum is shown and in addition sable black and snowy white are seen for the first time in photography.

The second picture is of particular interest to the Horse Show set, though presenting a view that every one can enjoy. It shows man's best friend in all the glory of Horse Show pageantry, and is entitled the "Royal Horse Show at Richmond"—this was taken at Richmond, England, during the forty days' coronation ceremonies at beautiful "Deer Park," which afforded a particularly happy background for the reproduction of this striking society event.

Particular interest attaches to these two pictures from the fact that a number of Americans showed in the various classes and won many prizes. Particular notice is given to Judge Moore, of Chicago, and Alfred Vanderbilt, of New York, who have been so successful at our own Horse Shows in former years, Judge Moore capturing three first prizes and one second and Mr. Vanderbilt one first and two second. The prizes were very beautiful, and those which will be shown in the picture were awarded by King Emanuel, the dethroned King of Portugal.

"The White Red Man," Rex Release, Is Popular in Chester, Pennsylvania

We have been advised by the "Rex" Motion Picture Company that their release, "The White Red Man," has met with very flattering success wherever shown and numerous letters have been received by them complimenting this picture, which is an unusually strong one. In Chester, Pa., it was shown several times with great success, and some enthusiastic patrons were commenting on the fine photography and acting, when some dispute arose as to the exact feet covered by the Indian hero in jumping from precipice to the water and swimming to shore.

In this film we might state, for the benefit of the interested parties, that the Indian jumps off a precipice eighty feet high into the water and following this unusual dive swims a quarter of a mile to the opposite shore. This is an unusual feature in motion pictures, and we take pleasure in putting the many friends of "Rex" straight and the brethren of Chester can now settle their dispute and wait for some more of the unusual "Rex" releases, which they are continually putting out.

Aurora, Neb.—A Mr. Hopkins, of Kearney, has purchased the Lyric Theater here.

Minneapolis, Minn.—Emma C. Hagstrom, 1704 E. Lake Street, will establish moving picture theater to cost $1,500.

Norfolk, Va.—The Ford Brothers, who have conducted the show in Pythian Castle have sold their interest to Joseph C. Boss.

Coryville, Ohio.—Wm. E. Brown will erect a new theater at 2316 Vine Street.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

Education in the films is much discussed, but little developed. So far from being educational, a larger proportion of the films put out are merely entertaining. No criticism is intended against such films, but the assertion is ventured that they might find increasing popularity by developing the educational opportunities which are presented.

A large number of subjects will present themselves to almost anyone, many of which can be obtained without great difficulty or expense, which ought to be an item with producers. The film which educates can entertain. There is nothing to hinder a development along this line which would make the motion picture more interesting and valuable than it is now. It would, in effect, be following the lines of the modern educational movements, making the education a matter of play rather than actual work. In other words, the educational film can be made so entertaining that the audience will like it and want more of the same sort.

A good drama is not to be despised, but there are educational subjects which would have all the elements of the drama, but in addition would instruct.

The travelogs which are issued now are helpful, but they do not give detail enough, as a rule. They are merely a series of pictures without sufficient explanation to make their meaning clear. This is a fault which could be easily overcome, and then the long list of excellent travelogs could be included in the educational series. Biblical pictures might also be included. They are educational and afford a clearer impression of the real life of ancient times than any amount of description could do. All pictures which show how some business operation is conducted, or anything which illustrates life in little known countries belong in the list of educational subjects, but frequently they are scarcely clear because the sub-titles do not sufficiently explain them. Perhaps they are quite enough for the ordinary purpose, amusement, but when instruction is added they will have to be made clearer, else the audience will fail in understanding and the principal purpose will be lost.

There is sufficient demand for such pictures to warrant their production, and there would be more demand if the pictures were made with that purpose in view. The life of the motion picture depends upon the interest it creates in mixed audiences. And here is one feature which has never been utilized as much as it might have been. The first producer who develops this as much as he might will reap a corresponding liberal reward.

THE SONG

To be or not to be. That is the question. Whether the song should be developed or banished is a question which is difficult to decide. Probably in most locations the song is still a favorite, provided it is properly presented. But with the presentation of illustrated songs for the past few years the public has become critical and has now developed a demand for the latest. The illustrations, too, must be of the best. Because of this it has become something of a problem to present these songs in the most attractive way. The manager that does it will add that as a drawing attraction to his show.

Good illustrations will compensate for much, but they cannot make up for the lack of a good voice. Either man or woman should have a good voice, otherwise the song is a failure. Almost everyone who visits a motion picture theater has heard these popular songs somewhere or is singing them at home. Therefore, they are known and understood. The result is a critical taste which is worth cultivating and satisfying.

Make the song the best you can obtain in subject, slides and rendering, and you will make it an important part of your entertainment. Neglect and it will help to empty your playhouse.

Woman's Eternal Vanity

Woman — collectively — is good, sweet, tender, true — and vain! Women have often transgressed to obtain the things they craved. They have sinned for men's admiration and man's love, they have erred to obtain the means of winning men's worship and other women's envy.

"The Torn Scarf"

RELEASED THURSDAY, AUGUST 31st

is a picture of woman's vanity, the weakness which permitted her to indulge it, and the evil it led to. A strong, well constructed plot, perfect technique and detail, strong, tense, forceful acting, a powerful climax and a happy ending. Can you picture it? REX can — and did! All you need do is — Get it!

FROM THE OBSERVATORY

By G. F. Blaisdell

PRESIDENT NEFF, of the National Exhibitors, hit a big nail squarely on the head when he said to the convention: "We are going to fight to keep vaudeville out of the moving picture show houses and moving pictures out of vaudeville. We think moving pictures should stand out as a separate form of entertainment and do not think that the mixing in of vaudeville is necessary to make moving pictures a profitable investment." As for Mr. Neff's statement that "We want moving pictures perfected to a point where pictures can be shown in daylight" there is a possibility the president has not seen the glass screen in daylight use. Having on several occasions had the pleasure of seeing pictures in daylight at Connor's New Empire at Coney Island the writer is in position to say that the point so much desired by Mr. Neff has been reached.

Mr. Neff's plea for an adjustment of the differences between the two factions in the motion picture industry is timely. It is probably true that the opposition to such a conciliation would not come from the Independents. Yet if the licensed manufacturers persist in their attitude of assumed overlordship it is a confession of the weakness of their position. Why should not the so-called Trust (which it absolutely is not—for trust spells monopoly) come out frankly and say:

"We have money, plants and experience, and we believe we can compete in an open market with any manufacturer or group of manufacturers in this country. We will give to the American exhibitor the privilege of selecting such films as he may in his judgment deem best adapted to his clientele."

That would be an American standpoint. The licensed manufacturers may increase their output, their sales may increase, but will their expansion as regards the industry as a whole be in an increasing ratio? The experience of the past two years would indicate that it will not. On the contrary, the indications are that the ratio will decrease. For this statement there are obvious reasons. The Independent is a live wire. His customers pay not one cent for tribute; and he has "millions for defense." Independent product as it increases in quantity improves in quality. Some of it may contain a little too much of the sensational to suit the more conservative, but in pictures as in newspapers it is the sensational that appeals to a great many people.

In the manufacture of motion pictures the basic factor of success is Applied Brains. Of these there is and can be no monopoly.

Cinematography moves on. Why should its momentum be hampered or impeded by internecine strife? Why should the house be divided against itself?

James Forbes, director of the National Association for the Prevention of Mendicancy, described as "the tramp's most sympathetic friend and his bitterest enemy," proposes by means of moving pictures and publications to hold up to the boys of the country the forbidding picture of tramp life. Mr. Forbes estimates there are a quarter of a million tramps and professional beggars in the United States, and says the number is growing. Especial attention will be paid to railroad towns, as it is from these, he declares, that the ranks of hoboes are largely recruited.

It looks as if the provision in the New York State law requiring that applicants for operators' licenses shall have served as apprentice for six months will have to be ignored. A bill repealing this requirement was vetoed by Governor Dix. As New York City is practically the only municipality that has heretofore required operators to be licensed, the legal authorities throughout the rest of the state are in a predicament. This will be a case where common sense will overturn a veto.

Louis Morisette, Augustus Carney and Charles Guerro were bruised. The quartet were able to walk back to San Rafael.

The Rev. Dr. C. C. Oliver, a Baptist minister of Pittsburg, has ideas on the moving picture question. They are well worth consideration. Dr. Oliver brings to his discussion of the subject a knowledge founded on years of sympathetic study of sociological conditions—as they are, if the writer's apparently paradoxical qualification will be permitted.

"Reformers err when they shout that moving picture films should not be reproduced," said Dr. Oliver. "Their vitriolic criticism—the letters to the editor kind—is handled in the news columns alongside articles concerning robberies and murder.

"The thing which justifies the reviewing of homicides and other brutalities is that some virtue must come of them. The editors' excuse, rightfully perhaps, is that the triumph of uprightness will teach its own lesson to whitewash the whole world.

"What trash the modern novel would be without a villain; what if the eyes were closed to the fact that evil exists, if every book was like 'Little Women'?

"Pictures which do portray crime and in which the denouement of the story is punishment for the bad and reward for the good I shall always recommend. They teach how to avoid the swindler, how to take proper precautions against the malefactor, and if a few weak-minded persons are led to imitate the villain the principle is in no way proved false. The person who would be evilly influenced, especially when the adventuress or adventurer is foiled, is bad at heart, anyway."

Here's a new and heretofore unthought of menace to the moving picture industry: During a storm on the 15th inst. at New Rochelle, N. Y., water flooded the aisles of a moving picture house. Women and children had to stand on the seats, and, worse still, the pianist had to seek refuge on the top of her instrument. The women and children were carried out by men, who waded through the aisles. A municipal ordinance requiring that life preservers be strapped under every chair would seem to be in order. Also the pianist should be trained to manipulate the reversed keys. The poor marooned women must have experienced one consoling, relieving thought—they were at least secure from the ravages of great prowling mice.

In discussing the request of the National Exhibitors' Association for representation on the Board of Censorship the Rochester (N. Y.) Union says editorially:

"The request of the showmen is perfectly proper and reasonable. They are interested quite as much as are the manufacturers in the kind of story that is told in the moving picture. They have received practically all the blame for the exhibition of objectionable pictures. The blame should now be placed where it belongs. The independent manufacturers of films, we are glad to note, told the convention that they would be glad to receive suggestions from a committee appointed by the convention. The so-called trust was not heard from at the convention, but there is hope that it will accede to the request of the exhibitors. If it does, the sentiment against moving picture shows, as places where young minds may be corrupted, will grow less, for the exhibitors are surely good enough business men to condemn pictures which they feel will displease their public."

According to the Sterling (Ill.) Standard, "Alderman Robinson, of Beloit, exploded a bombshell in the council the other night when he offered a resolution that the city attorney be instructed to prepare a bill providing for the censorship of moving pictures, vaudeville shows, theatrical productions and dances in the city." That Beloit town must be a bad place. Not that there should be any excitement over the fact that a fatherly city father would clap his eagle eye on the evil motion picture, but to attempt to restrict the "legit"—to interfere with the interpretation of real dramatists by real artists—not to mention the bracketing of it with moving pictures and dance halls—surely is too much. Of course, it is to be assumed that the moving picture is responsible for the decadence of the drama in Beloit.

Mayor J. E. Nissley, of Guthrie, Okla., who also is superintendent of the State Sunday School Association, and N. M. Carter, county commissioner of public safety, received complaints that a film portraying a bull fight was to be displayed at one of the local theaters on a Sunday evening. They immediately "took in" the show and then decreed that the bull fight was not a proper subject for Sunday evening exhibition. There should be no serious difference of opinion on that decision.

Through the contact of a film with an electric wire in the operator's booth in the Gem Theater, in Toronto, on August 11th, a thousand dollars' damage was done. A fireproofed booth would have prevented that.

A dog frothing at the mouth ran into a picture house at Franklin and DeKalb avenues, Brooklyn, and, according to one story, "seemed inclined to attack the children." Fortunately there was a strap attached to his collar, and the animal kindly permitted a man in the audience to wind it about his neck and strangle him—dog's neck, of course.

Sometime between 11 o'clock on the night of August 14 and the same hour the following day the projecting machine of the Royal Theater, Haekensack, N. J., was stolen. D. C. Hayden, the proprietor, could find no clue to indicate the thief. It required some hustling on the part of Mr. Hayden to get another machine installed for his regular show. This is the second experience of this sort for Hackensack exhibitors, several years ago a complete equipment being made away with.

Here's a new and perhaps altogether good way to put in a Sunday: Miss Ida Mayer of Jamaica, L. I., on the morning of August 13, in the absence of the regular pastor, preached from the pulpit of the Jamaica Baptist Church. In the evening she kept a watchful eye on her Fulton Street picture theater, while her brother, a Methodist minister from Troy, N. Y., conducted services in the church at which she had spoken in the morning. Miss Mayer, who is an elocutionist and a lecturer, says that the incongruity in this particular Sunday programme is more seeming than real, "for," she says, "the work is good and helpful." Miss Mayer's manager, Robinson Germond, confesses that he is a man of many ideals. "I believe," he says, "that we can teach lessons by the pictures which will be productive of good. I want every child to go away from the house stronger and better." As reported by one of the local journalistic sob sisters Mr. Germond, in speaking of his programme for this particular Sunday evening, is made to say:

"Yes, it was beautiful. Before I showed any films at all I read the audience the story of the Prodigal Son. I wasn't interrupted once, and then I showed the life of the prodigal in a series of pictures. Can you tell me that didn't have in it the elements of moral stature?

"In order to make it more personal in character, I had the audience sing 'Where Is My Wandering Boy To-Night?' It was completely touching and most worthy of the day. I shall hereafter prepare and give the audiences other lessons depicting the wages of sin, the glory of repentance and the triumph over temptation, with suitable songs to enforce the idea of the text."

Beautiful, undoubtedly. It is a question, though, if a theater audience more cosmopolitan than could be found in Jamaica would be exactly charmed with the story of the Prodigal Son or go into ecstacy over singing "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-Night?" As a rule, if a man or woman wants that line of entertainment the church is the place to seek it. Anyone who imposes any such programme on the public without giving advance notice at the box office comes perilously near taking money under false pretenses.

A manager of production is far more competent to point a moral in his pictures than is the manager of a show. Furthermore, an attendant at a picture show will prefer to pass his own judgment on a film and not to be bored by the interpretation of a man who should know that people go to look at pictures to see and not to hear.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., Aug. 23.—In looking over the last issue of the Moving Picture News I was much interested in the notes prepared by Brother G. F. Blaisdell, in which he stated that we would have to hand it to the residents of Colorado because they had caused to be taken several thousand feet of moving pictures of their state, which are to be shown throughout the United States. Yes, that is enterprise, sure enough, but, Brother Blaisdell, whilst you are handing out bouquets, slip one over the Ozarks and let it fall "In the Valley of Vapors," for we are some strong in that line ourselves.

After several months of negotiations the Business Men's League, of which no finer or more progressive or gamer bunch ever lived, closed negotiations with a moving picture firm in Chicago, whereby Hot Springs, its scenic wonders—and there is "some scenery" here, believe me—together with the great beneficial effects of the baths, including, too, all the important things of the city that go to make it the greatest health resort in the world, will be released on a reel of pictures and also be shown in the leading moving picture houses of the country; so, you, realizing this, Brother Blaisdell, can readily see that the people of the great state of Colorado "ain't such a much" after all, compared to the "live wires" constituting the membership in the Hot Springs Business Men's League.

And they are not stopping at that—bless your heart, no. Far be it from such. Pictures of that nature, while interesting, would lack the charm of a plot, so the moving photos depicting the wonders of the resort to which the tourists of the world come are to be backed by a plot. I am told it is something of this nature:

Rich old man marries beautiful young girl. Age makes their natures at odds. Husband takes sick and wifey is figuring out the premium of his life insurance policy. Her better half comes to Hot Springs to take the baths. He is met at the station, taken to one of the swell hotels, later gets his bathing paraphernalia and hikes to one of the city's palatial bathhouses. In the meantime the wife is gaily entertaining herself with one whose years suggest more consistency in the matrimonial line. Does "hubby" get well? Oh, "rawther." He goes for a drive throughout the city. (Get that point? Later, he is taken over the mountain driveways. (There's another one). His course of baths, how to take 'em, as well as the various stages of bathing, are all shown. Not bad, eh? and finally, rejuvenated and thrilled with the bubbling spirit of eternal youth, without warning his wife of the fact, he cuts for the old fireside. Society plays tell us husbands have a distressing habit of turning up at the most inconvenient and unexpected moment. That's the case here, but don't you know, when the young "goil" sees the old gentleman, and when she realizes that he has "come back" in more ways than one—why, she gives the hanger-on, who has amused her during the absence of the Lord of the Manor the high sign to "beat it" and rushes into the arms of her newly discovered "hope." That's some plot, think we of the West.

I am informed that the firm that took the pictures has made arrangements to have these pictures released under the auspices of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and that is what surprised me, for it is the first time that I learned that the Trust was entering the commercial fields. I am also informed that this is not the first commercial reel, either, that they have stood sponsor for. Whether the Trust or the Sales Company distributes the pictures is not the question that is the issue at present, for, as I stated, the contracts have been closed, and what we are waiting for out in these parts is the chance to take a "squint" at the reel when it is released. It is said the pictures will be kept on the market for a year; that as fast as one reel wears out another will be ready to take its place and that the minimum number of patrons to moving picture shows who will look at the Hot Springs pictures will aggregate seven million, and, we think, that is getting results.

The most important event since writing my last letter was the arrival in this city of no less a personage than the noted negro educator, Brooker T. Washington, and I want to go on record that the negro population of the city "Sho was it." Amusements and moving pictures, of course, had to be included in the big doings, and for a time it looked as if there would be no show, for the reason that one of the committee kicked on the price charged by the management of Whittington Park for the day's festivities. You see, that place of amusement has never catered to the negro patronage. In fact, there is a sign over the main entrance to that effect; also in their advertisements, but this was a special occasion and witnessed, too, the exception to the rule. The ones, however, who had charge of Booker T.'s entertainment, with that one exception, were mighty glad to get the park, and fearing that the negroes might lose by the venture Doc Owens, manager of the park, very graciously gave them a percentage of the receipts on four of the amusements in the park. The local negroes got fifty per cent of the receipts of the dance hall, palace of mystery, theater, where two vaudeville acts and three reels of moving pictures are shown, and seventy-five per cent of the baseball game. Besides this, the white people generously contributed some $300 to help entertain the well-known educator of the black race, and the day was, to them, one that will long be remembered.

The house that is doing a remarkable business in this city without the aid of vaudeville is the Lyceum, where Eddie Gavrel, the new proprietor, has made wonderful improvements. I stepped inside that theater the past week and was delighted with the change that has taken place there. It is ideal in every respect. The floor slopes to a pleasing angle; one can see the pictures from any seat in the house and in stepping into the aisle the floor meets it without any inconvenient stepping up or down. Pictures change every day at the Lyceum, and they are good pictures, too.

Harry Hale, the only theater manager running vaudeville and who is doing an excellent business, continues to give his patrons a great run for their money, and when you see the Lyric show you can gamble that you've got your money's worth. Two good vaudeville acts are given in this theater, together with two reels of moving pictures, and the able manner in which the latter are illustrated by the orchestra is a delight in every way. The orchestra at the Lyric is one of its big features.

* * *

"Jupiter Pluvius" put the Airdome out of commission several nights this week, but the attraction there, the Whitticar Stock Company, played to good business the nights it didn't rain. It poured so often, though, that some "wag" sent Frank Head the following:

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen—
The show is off; it's rained again."

The Princess will be closed for a couple of weeks in order to get the house ready for the annual vaudeville season, which will open the latter part of the month or the first week in September.

There is a most active little being playing havoc, I hear, with the hearts of two of the city's moving picture operators. The little elf is none other than "Dan Cupid," and two of the boys are "all shot to pieces." The wedding bells, I am told, are due to ring pretty soon. But just the exact date when "Pat" Gilliam and Leo King intend to forego single blessedness, deponent sayeth not. The former gives the patrons of the Lyric an excellent picture and Leo does the same honors at the Lyceum. I asked "Pat" when he was going to get married, and he told me to go to—well, he told me to go to my desk and read my answer in the stars.

As stated by my better half in last week's letter, it is truly a shame that none of the houses are showing Independent pictures. One reads of what Independent manufacturers are doing, yet can only wish that their products might get a hearing in this city. Some day the real wise "geek" will come along who will run nothing but first run Independent pictures, then watch some of the managers "flop" after him. The Trust pictures the past six days were rather good, and among those deserving of mention were Biograph's reel, "Jinks Joins the Temperance Club," Edison's "Willie Raises Tobacco," and Essanay sent us two good pictures in "Five Bold, Bad Men," which caused roars of laughter, and the "Clown's Baby," which was filled with heart interest. A little more circus feature would have added interest to the latter reel. Kalem, one of the best of the week was your reel, "Reckless Reddy Reforms." It was a dandy, and would have done Kalem and all the little Kalems a world of good to have noted the appreciation. "The Mexican Joan of Arc" was a timely picture and was featured heavily by the Lyceum Theater. There is one picture that "Dad" Lubin's willing workers sent the past week, the name of which I cannot recall, but it pertained to a mountain feud, which, however, was settled by the sons and daughters of the opposing factions. What I started out to say regarding this reel was that it was of unusual interest and made a decided hit. The reel was unique in many ways, and any manager that missed it overlooked a good beat and sure winner. Miss Lawrence was quite her old self in that picture. Pathe presented an interesting if not edifying picture of the "Paris Slums," but Selig's "Knight Errant," which was billed heavily, fell short of expectations. It was too much like cheap melodrama and did not impress one as was expected. "Caught With the Goods," on the same reel, was a real laugh-getter.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

The Howe Travel Festival continues to hold attention, and a full house at the Columbia Theater. The public will ever be interested in the views and customs of other lands, and Mr. Howe knows how to present these in the most interesting manner. To the stay-at-home these have furnished no end of pleasure and consolation. In the present hour, when air travel is occupying so much of our thoughts, the exhibition of the hydroplane, for navigating both water and air, was particularly interesting. Perhaps Mr. Howe thought the Paris fashions would interest mostly the women of the Capital City, but the masculine contingent was just as much pleased at this part of the show. I have no doubt that some of the stay-at-home husbands will be telling their wives what will be the styles next winter, and they will be wondering how they knew so much.

The Stampede, the third of the Ft. Myer pictures, by the Solax Company, which appeared at the Empress on the day of release, was even more enjoyed than the previous photoplays of this series. Some good dramatic effects were gathered and some fine horsemanship displayed.

Word has been received from Tom Moore and his wife in the mountains of Virginia, where both have been enjoying rest and quiet. Before returning to the city next month, they will most likely visit the beautiful scenery of Delaware Water Gap and nearby points. Before leaving Washington Mr. Moore secured the services of Mr. Mack, who was formerly with Mr. Moore, and installed him in his Washington office to assist in looking after affairs. When this was done the veteran exchange man and recent exhibitor felt more at ease to leave the city. The Moore Amusement Company is steadily gaining in influence and profits.

Mr. Manvel is now at the head of the orchestra at the Cosmos as successor to John B. Bovello. He is an excellent musician and has done some composing and has gained a reputation as a quick and accurate orchestrator. Work in this last capacity has come to him from many out-of-town demands.

So pleased, and so wonderstruck were the people of Washington with the presentation of Kinemacolor, and so financially successful was this venture, that these marvelous views were retained in the city for another week, offering matinee and evening exhibitions at the Belasco Theater. The interest manifested in the naval review at the Coronation in England, as well as the unveiling of the Victoria monument and the investiture of the Prince of Wales as a Knight of the Garter, was so great that these scenes were repeated the second week and in addition Dante's Inferno was unfolded in all its sombreness, its allegorical lesson, its artistic setting, and the philosophy of the great poet. The presentation of the royal jewels gave a more adequate idea of the uninitiated of the magnificence and costliness of these insignias, which must indeed be somewhat weighty with all their beauty.

Perhaps the best test of the nature work of Kinemacolor was that presented in the landscape scenes, especially those of life on the farm. It is a pity that those chickens will never know how much applause they received, and yet, it was not so much the chickens as Kinemacolor. That this shows the work and experiments of a decade of years of an Englishman, Mr. Smith, and an American, Mr. Urban, is soon forgotten in the wonder and pleasure experienced by the spectator, and it is quite possible that even the inventors have ceased to recall many of their trials and discouragements in the successful accomplishment of their efforts and the "new art" they have given to the world. When a process so entirely novel can be given to the public at a cost of from 25 to 50 cents, I believe it will not be long before Kinemacolor will become a 10-cent show. Yet I would like to predict that Kinemacolor will always maintain a certain dignity that will exclude from its use inartistic and "trashy" subjects. It will become the painter, who always seeks to attract by something natural or artistic.

A few words of praise must be given to the man who contributed much toward the understanding and pleasure of Kinemacolor, and this is Arthur Lotto, who with a clear delivery prefaced each reel with entertaining remarks. Too much speech detracts from the moving picture, which tells its own story; but historical events are made much more valuable by some terse words of explanation. This is the part Mr. Lotto plays in Kinemacolor, and he plays it well. He is so familiar with his subject that he picks out the heart of the event presented and shows it to the spectators in the most interesting manner. There is a personality about the remarks of this speaker that makes you feel that he is addressing them to you alone in a parlor conversation, though his voice is carrying and his diction distinct.

PACIFIC COAST NEWS

From Our San Francisco Correspondent

There is much speculation among picture men out here as to the real personality of an emissary of the Patents Company, who is running up a pretty stiff expense bill under a number of aliases going to and fro seeking who(se) camera he may devour. The activities of this gentleman are worthy of a better cause, and are not producing much result.

The Patents Company may have sent out this gentleman to strike terror into the hearts of the Independents or would-be Independents who dare to make a few feet of film; or it may be that his special work is to get possession in an alleged legal manner of certain infringing cameras, trying to repeat the history of the injunction against the Great Western of a year ago.

In both matters he is proving a worse bluff than any the Patents Company has ever tried, and that is saying something.

If the "General" permits its hirelings to read the "News," it will be interesting to Mr. McCoy to know that at the present time there are at least six Warwick cameras in and around San Francisco, and all of them are in almost constant use. I know of one gentleman at least who would give more than the price of a camera to have his apparatus "pinched" by the trust. This personage is probably a millionaire, and is at least backed in whatever photographic work he undertakes by more millions than even the Patents Company has got. Now WHY don't the process servers get busy?

By the time this is in the press, the Industrial Exhibition will have been opened in the Auditorium. This is expressly a Californian trade boosting organization, and the exhibition is one of unusual merit. At this ten days' show the Southern Pacific will give a free continuous performance consisting of moving pictures of Californian scenery with descriptive lectures.

And they will use an Edison machine with a Loop!

Said a Native Daughter to me the other day: "Of course, it is NOT the THINKING class that attends the moving picture shows."

I said that statement would need some weighty evidence before I could agree with it.

"Oh," said she, "I have noticed it in every moving picture show I have been to."

"But how many times have you been to a show?"

"I go about three times a week."

"Then, my dear young lady, perhaps your statement may be more nearly correct than I thought."

And she, a Californian, didn't see the point.

A new picture show and penny arcade has opened up in the Mission district of San Francisco. You will remember the Chutes burning a few weeks back. Well, the funny thing is, the arcade fittings are the same as were "destroyed" in the fire; at least, that is the general opinion.

About that Chutes fire, too, there was a funny tragedy. On one corner of the building was a high flag pole which did not burn. The day after the fire, a poor solitary monkey was seen on the very top of the pole, and all efforts to bring him down, or even move him one inch from his perch, failed. At last someone thought to rap the bottom of the pole with a hammer. At the first stroke, Jacko slid down the pole, stone dead.

Ground was broken this week for a new theater in Oakland, to be run under the Sullivan-Considine circuit. That makes two new Class A theaters in Oakland, and one in Berkeley, now under construction. Things are beginning to hum in these cities around the Bay.

Hardly a week passes without a non-infringing camera being "invented" out here. This seems to me a waste of ingenuity. The Gaumont is good enough for us, if they won't let us use the Warwick.

* * *

One thing is gradually filtering into the brain of the public out here, thanks, in great measure, to the aggressiveness of the Sales Company. That is, that if the Independents say they are going to make films willy-nilly, they will come pretty near doing it.

August 12, 1911.

Eighty-eight degrees in the shade and business still comparatively good, if all we hear is true. Manufacturers at all events, are unanimous that sales show practically no diminution, so that the old belief that the living picture business could never be other than a seasonable one seemed to be knocked finally on the head. Some producers still make a practice of holding over the big things to the winter, however—result, plethora of headiners in November and December and consequently drop in sales, while one or two wise firms announce specials for the summer months and do big business. Selig, and Cricks & Martin, in particular are to be congratulated on the results of the policy which after all is the only one fair to the showman, who otherwise finds himself with a mediocre programme when he most needs special attractions to pull the public; in face of the competition of out-door amusements.

I am authorized to state that Barker Motion Photography, Ltd., who hold the living picture rights of the Johnson-Wells Co., are open to receive tenders for the American privileges. Here's a chance for a living picture man to have a gamble—nothing in it if Johnson wins, possibly, unless he has a particularly tough job of it, but if Wells should bring off the trick (and stranger things have happened in pugilistic history) what a feature film it would be and what a price could be obtained for it. It would beat Johnson-Burns or Johnson-Jeffries out of sight—the latter, as a matter of fact, was the flattest of flat things in this market. Its price kept exhibitors off at the beginning and the resolution of the London County Council deprecating its exhibition did it no good as far as the London area was concerned.

If you were to ask any of the regular film buyers of this country whose quality they considered to reach the highest level, you would find few but would give the palm to "Eclair." "Eclair quality," in fact, is about the highest form of praise you could use toward the product of any maker. In the opinion of some, however, Eclair plots are not up to the standard of the photography. I don't agree with this; personally, I regard the A. C. A. D. comedies as the perfection of living picture humor; it must be granted, however, that much of their work is too delicate and slight to be popular. It is not always the great artistic success that brings most into the coffers; the showman is out to supply "what the public wants" and the public unfortunately does not always want the best Eclair, therefore, while of course they sell many copies of their subjects, have not always been rewarded according to the, in my opinion, really remarkable standard of their subjects.

I did not set out to record a lament, however, but to announce that many signs point to a realization by this company of the necessity for stories of a more popular nature. That they can produce "thrilling drama" and "screaming comedy" with the best can not be doubted in view of the success of such series as "Nick Carter," "Rifle Bill," and "Morgan the Pirate," the sales of which used to leave such a pleased expression on the face of Mr. Collier, when he handled these goods for the Tyler Film Co., in their original offices in Waterloo Road now. It seems we are to have more subjects, not quite so dashing as these, but still containing a good deal of that direct action which appeals so strongly to the public.

First there is, under the title, "The Legend of the Eagle," a series of subjects, founded on the famous series of novels of the same title, and detailing incidents in Napoleon's campaign. Number one of these is splendid and if the others are as good, there should be good sales. In addition to this, Tylers are this week showing a special three reel subject, "Zigomar," which is a splendid example of fine staging and vivid action. It needs a good subject to make a three-thousand-footer go in this country, but this Eclair will not probably be found lacking in the essentials of success. With such subjects as these and with the amusing "Charlie" and "Tommy" adventures which they issue periodically, Eclair seems destined to boom larger than ever in the public eye.

Mr. Hayman, of the New Agency Film Co., who already possesses a remarkably strong agency in Ambrosio, is to be congratulated on the advances which another of the firms he represents, Pasquali, are making. Chiefly noted heretofore for their travel subjects, Pasquali are coming out strong on drama of the "Raffles" kind—plenty of incident and action—while their two first comics were among the best I have seen. Keep an eye on this firm, which will be well to the fore shortly unless I am much mistaken.

There has been quite a shuffling of agencies here recently. Mr. J. F. Brockliss has, I understand, acquired the rights of sale for the "Milano" goods for all European countries, barring Italy. The Cosmopolitan Co., which previously handled "Milano," now has "Latimer" and "Helios," the former one of the makes which Walturdaw handled and the latter, to the best of my belief, one of Mr. Brockliss'. In addition, "Rex" have appeared on this market, represented by the American & Continental Film Agency, a concern with which Mr. Bowden, once of "Flying A," is associated as manager and which also handles some other agencies, including the "Film D'Art." Rex should do well, if their films are as good as we have been given to understand.

The Globe Service will enter upon its new premises in a few days, while other firms which have experienced the need for more elbow room are the Magnet Film Co., Ltd., and the Kinema Film Hiring Co. The latter will occupy Magnet's old place in St. Martin's Court and Magnet goes to 85 Shaftesbury avenue. Williamson's are also moving to premises in Charing Cross Road.

Most important of all these changes, however, is the announcement that the "Flying A" films will shortly be no longer handled by the Western Import & Film Co., but by a specially formed company, "The American Film Manufacturing Co. (London), Ltd.," which will probably open branches in England and the Colonies. Mr. Hutchinson, president of the present American Company, completed all arrangements before he sailed back to America on Wednesday. I understand no change in the personnel of the London staff is contemplated.

"Kinemacolor" has brought Mr. Chas. Urban right to the front as one of the leading personalities of London amusement circles. Latest evidence to that fact is a full-page cartoon in the new paper, "Men of the Day," accompanied by appreciative biography. Moreover, the cartoon is by "Shy" of "Vanity Fair" fame, who, with the great Max Beerbohm and many other men famous with pen and pencil, are the bright particular stars of the new venture.

Note a rather misleading misprint in News of the 22d of July in first paragraph of which I am made to refer to the opening of Selig's office "last week." There should have been a full stop before these words. I wrote "Last week's bioscope." Selig's office here has, of course, been open for several months.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

By L. W. D.

The Potentialities of the "Topical" Film

The recent busy "topical" season in England gives rise to the question—Will the picture theater ever oust the newspaper as a recorder of topical events? The public of the not far distant future will, in the opinion of the writer, go to the picture theater for the pictures of current events they desire to see, and purchase newspapers for printed news, and not for the indistinct "snapshots" of recent happenings. Of course, before this is accomplished there will have to be considerable improvement and development in cinematography. The telegraphing of motion pictures, a matter I referred to briefly in a previous article, is certain to be utilized when perfect, for supplying the picture theater with the very latest pictorial news. Thus, the picture theater will form a mirror of the world's events, presenting them in the exact manner in which they occurred.

The possibilities of the topical film has been the subject of discussion on the other side of the "pond" for a considerable time. The following are the views of a leading newspaper man. "No mechanical device," he says, "however contrived, however popularly eulogized, can be presumed to supplant the empire of flesh and blood, of voice, character, and vital emotional presentation. The kinematograph must remain spectacular. Its limitations must obviate any acute development. Its instructive potentialities appear to be more in the direction of science than of drama. The mobility of its sequacious photography has been proved to be of considerable utility in observing and reproducing various processes and phenomena. The kinematograph has besides to combat an internal peril. Its market is so colossal, and the public demand so voracious, that the quality of the production tends to become stereotyped and depreciated. Some of its drama is positively incoherent. It has neither head nor tail, it is all amorphous body. The comedy lends itself to a parade of athletic rough and tumble, and has not evoked a "high consciousness." The "Woolly West" figures ad infinitum, but it is quite pleasant and exciting. Curiously enough, some of the acting, in spite of its hastiness and lack of finish, is very presentable and has occasional poignancy. But, speaking generally, there is pressing need all over the United Kingdom for diversity of theme and interest. Without that, that which has sprung up like a mushroom in the morning must inevitably be withered at even. When the primal attractiveness has flagged, what has the kinematograph in reserve for the lean years? At present (here reference is made to the topical film) public demand goes in the direction of representation of contemporaneous events. The funeral of King Edward VII gave the kinematograph industry a great chance, and the Coronation procession has given them a greater one. A Derby struggle, or a Cup final, or a 'Varsity boat race—these are the things which the people like to see, and it seems to us that the success of the kinematograph will depend on catering for the public, by a constant supply of films presenting those things which people talk must of from day to day." What do you say, reader?

"THE PATCHED SHOE"

Solax Release August 30

Andy Noodles, an adventure-craving rustic, reads the advertisement of a bogus detective agency where for the sum of $10 they will make him a "member of their force." After receiving his "Commission" and "Star," he sallies forth in search of adventure. He sees John Martin climbing out of his own window, having been locked in by his little daughter, Mabel. Andy takes him for a thief, examines his footsteps and discovers one of his shoes has a patched sole and follows the trail. Then follows a series of funny incidents in which several people wear the patched shoe and Andy follows them all. He ends up in the Martin home and is finally thrown out, much to the amusement of all but Andy, who leaves swearing never again.

"THE HOLD-UP"

Solax Release Sept. 1

Lieutenant Harris and Mr. Drake, a wealthy but unscrupulous mine owner, are both in love with Colonel Barnes' daughter Ethel, but the Lieutenant is the favored one, much to Drake's chagrin. He swears vengeance. Later on he hears Lieutenant Harris and some of his brother officers laughingly conspiring to hold up the ambulance which is returning from the station with some of their comrades. They think if they disguise themselves effectively and do the job in the "bandit' 'style will be a great joke.

Drake utilizes his knowledge to wreck the Lieutenant's hopes and possibly lose his life.

He immediately informs the Colonel that the ambulance is to be held up, but fails to inform him that it is a joke or who the "bandits" really are.

The Colonel immediately sends a troop of cavalry to stop the "hold-up" with orders to "shoot to kill." They are just about to fire on the supposed brigands when Kitty, a friend of Ethel's, who is cognizant of Drake's intentions, arrives on the scene just in time to prevent a tragedy. However, the "bandits" are marched to the Colonel for explanations, but he likes the Lieutenant and his comrades and, realizing that they meant no real harm, lets them go with a reprimand

Every one is delighted but Drake, who is rightly ostracized for his malevolent intentions.

"THE TORN SCARF"

Rex Release, August 31

Women have often transgressed to obtain the things they craved. They have sinned for men's admiration and man's love, they have transgressed to obtain the means of winning men's worship or other women's envy.

Antone and Jose, two brothers, work hard to pay off the mortgage on their vineyard. Jose lives with his brother and Rose, his wife. Antone goes to town with a consignment of wine, and in his absence a scarf dealer calls at the shack, and tempts her to purchase his wares. The gaudy scarfs appeal to her. Woman's most vincible weakness, her vanity, longs for the cloth. The lure of the colors is on her, and unable to deny herself the sweet pleasure of owning it, she goes to a niche in the wall where the brothers hoard their meagre savings and, with the hard-earned bagatelle, buys the scarf.

Her brother-in-law, upon his return to the shack in the evening, asks her how and where she obtained the scarf, and the woman lies to avoid incriminating herself. But Jose divines the truth, and seeking the money, discovers it to be missing. He denounces her as a thief, and the woman, to save herself from having her offense disclosed to her husband, plunges her stiletto into her brother-in-law. In the short struggle which follows the guilty scarf is torn. Leaving him apparently dead, she rushes from the house. Then the realization of the full enormity of her double sin dawns upon her, and, stricken with repentance and remorse, she re-enters the house. She works hard to bring the man back to consciousness, and at last her efforts are rewarded. Pitifully she pleads for her brother-in-law's silence, asking him to spare her from her husband's execration. Her tears, as of old, at last accomplish what her rage and stubborn struggle failed to achieve; she wins Jose's forgiveness and friendship, and upon the return of her husband he claims the ownership of the torn scarf, thus shielding his erring sister-in-law,—a generous hero and a lenient judge.

BILL AS A GAME-KEEPER

"Lux" Release September 1

Bill as a game-keeper is really almost the limit in eccentricity. Having applied successfully for the post of game-keeper, Bill is set upon his duties, which he pursues with his usual whole-heartedness and entire irresponsibility. Laden with enormous guns and game-bags of prodigious size, he makes his way through the woods until he surprises two poachers "in the very act." Without more ado he takes shelter behind a tree and fires. The miscreants fly, with Bill's grotesque figure in full chase behind them. They take refuge in a tree, but the new game-keeper is fully equal to the occasion and prepares to follow. He is not as nimble as his prey, however, and gets rather badly left behind until he catches the poachers in the river. Boldly he follows, but his bags are too much for him and he sinks beneath the surface. We are in imminent danger of losing our well-beloved Bill forever, when he is fished out at the eleventh hour by a couple of anglers, who promptly stand him upon his head and administer artificial respiration. Thus we leave him, a very damp and half-dead Bill, but "always merry and bright."

"THE INVISIBLE WRESTLER"

"Lux" Release September 1

This is a skillfully devised and amusing trick film. It is certain to set audiences agog to find out "How it is done," whilst the humor of the various situations will keep the house rolling with merriment. A certain famous wrestler challenges all comers, and in response there steps forward a dapper young man, who certainly seems no match for the burly professional. But there is more in him than meets the eye, for no sooner have the combatants closed than the newcomer renders himself invisible, to the amazement of the spectators and the dismay of his opponent. Thus they have it up and down, the amateur constantly appearing and disappearing meanwhile, much to the professional's discomfiture. As may be imagined, the invisible wrestler gains the victory and is decorated with a gold chain, which is placed around his neck by the referee with some difficulty, owing to the elusiveness of the person. Besides being exceedingly ingenious, the film is admirably acted, and it is sure to please everybody.

"BLACK CLOUD'S DEBT"

Powers Release August 22

Black Cloud, while drowning, is rescued by Little Crow, an Indian of another tribe. Black Cloud takes him as a brother. Both fall in love with the same squaw. Little Crow is chosen by the tribe to carry the totem bag to a friendly tribe. Little Crow is afraid, so Black Cloud takes his place. He is wounded in a battle with a tribal enemy, but returns with a message in the totem bag which he gives to Little Crow, who carries them to the chief of his tribe. Running Fawn, thinking Little Crow is the hero, agrees to be his squaw. The deception is found out and Little Crow is sentenced to the wolf pit for twenty-four hours. Again Black Cloud takes his place, comes out unscratched, and Running Fawn, realizing he is the hero, and that she loves him, throws herself in his arms. Little Crow, in frenzy, tries to kill him, but Black Cloud disarms him and, satisfied that he had paid his debt, lets him go.

"AN INDIAN'S LOVE"

Powers Release August 26

Young Oak, a Shawnee Indian, deeply loves Blue Bird, a Choctaw maiden. She is also loved by a half breed gambler. Her father loses all at the cards and the half breed suggests playing the money against the girl. The old Indian consents. The half breed wins as usual and takes the young squaw with him. Young Oak, when he hears of this, takes the trail and overtakes the half breed on a fallen log stretched across a deep chasm, where we see one of the most realistic knife fights that have ever taken place. Young Oak defeats the half breed and as he plunges the knife into his chest the gambler falls to his death below. Young Blue Bird gladly allows Young Oak to lead her to the tents of his people.

"COUNT IVAN AND THE WAITRESS"

Thanhouser Release Sept. 5

Count Ivan, a wealthy Russian nobleman, is a dreamer, but not of revolutions. A bachelor, he has drifted into a placid old age, happy with his music and his books, and never contemplating any changes in the social conditions that surround him. But, just the same, he is accused of conspiracy, and to escape a sentence to Siberia that means death, he flees to America, landing practically penniless.

Music, that was once his sole relaxation, now becomes his sole means of support. He secures a position in a theater orchestra, and manages to earn a meagre living, until he incurs the enmity of the leader, and finds himself out in the street again.

There is a little shabby restaurant where the Count is accustomed to dine, when he can afford it. The waitress, a self-reliant young woman, likes him for his courtly manners and his unfailing politeness, and pities him for his loneliness and his failure to make his way in the world.

To obtain some money, the Count pawns his violin. The dealer sees a chance to get rid of a bad bill, and passes it on his unsophisticated customer. When the latter offers it at the restaurant he gets in serious trouble, and would have been arrested had it not been for the interference of the waitress, and the fact that the policeman summoned happened to be the man to whom she was engaged.

Later, when the Count falls exhausted in the street, it is the girl and her sweetheart who aid him, give him shelter and restore him to strength. As he tells her in a letter when he steals away, "Perhaps some day you will be rewarded for your kindness to a friendless old man." But at the time the day seems far distant. In fact, there is little chance that it will ever come to pass.

The Count's friends in Russia, although they have lost sight of him, have not been idle. They manage to prove to the Czar that the aged musician is not and never has been a conspirator. A royal pardon is issued and search for him is started. This hunt ends successfully, just when the unfortunate Count is at the lowest depths.

His first thought, when he regains his wealth, is to reward the humble friends who stood by him when he was "a friendless old man." He buys the restaurant where she is employed, leaves a fortune in the cash register, and departs for Russia, realizing that he has safeguarded the future of the girl whose unselfishness deserved the reward she received.

"ROMEO AND JULIET"

Part Two

Thanhouser Release Sept. 8

The first reel gave the complete story of Romeo's romantic courting of the fair Juliet, showing the sequence in the daring secret marriage. The second part starts with the banishment of Romeo from Padua. The play told of two rival noble families of Verona, who for several generations have been bitter foes. The offspring of these families, Juliet, daughter of the Capulets, and Romeo, son of the Montagues, meet and love, before they know that, on account of the family feud, they can never be united in marriage. Their love is too strong, however, to permit anything to stand in its way, and, knowing they can never obtain their parents' consent, they are secretly wed.

Shortly after this, young Romeo is banished from Padua for dueling, and is compelled to bid his young bride farewell. During his absence Capulet endeavors to force his daughter, Juliet, to marry a nobleman he has chosen for her.

In her distress Juliet turns to the friar who secretly married them. This kindly old man agrees to help the lovers. He gives Juliet a sleeping potion, which, after she has taken it, will make her seem dead. It is his intention to take the supposedly dead Juliet from her tomb and reunite her to her banished husband.

He sends a message to Romeo, telling him of the plan, but unfortunately news of Juliet's death reaches Romeo before the friar's message. The distracted youth purchases a vial of poison, and, taking it with him to the tomb where he finds the apparently lifeless body of Juliet, he drains the deadly potion. Juliet revives soon after this, and, finding on the steps of her tomb the body of her beloved husband, takes her own life. When the friar arrives upon the scene, intending to free Juliet, and unite the lovers, he finds them already tragically united in death.

"THE PARSON & THE BULLY"

Nestor Release August 30

"We want no sky-pilots here," Jim Hadler had sneeringly informed Parson Lewis, who, with his wife and two daughters, had selected that little Western town for their headquarters. The gun-fanner, with the support of White Hanson, ex-prize-fighter and boon companion, had long been the boys' acknowledged ruler, and now had no intention of another usurping that rule. He'd soon teach the old crank who was boss there, so the bully declared, and straightway not only broke up their meeting and shot the keys from their melodeon, but promptly knocked Parson Lewis down when he remonstrated with Hadler for attempting to kiss his daughters.

Nevertheless, the Parson was not discouraged. That night he dispatched a letter to his son, Webster, who had just been ordained, telling him to come at once, as he had found a community which particularly needed their assistance. However, so annoyed was Jim Hadler at the old gentleman's persistence that when Webster arrived the bully declared that nothing short of the young parson conquering his friend, the ex-prize-fighter, could persuade him into allowing the Lewis family to remain.

As an amateur boxer, Webster had won the decision in a number of good fast bouts, so as there seemed to be no alternative the young parson consented to meet the fighter in the ring. The boys stoutly insisted that they would stand by the champion, and in case of its being the parson, the proceeds were to be used in erecting a chapel.

At last the day for the fight arrived, and the combatants, in regular fighting attire, entered the ring. In the first two rounds Hanson's blows seemed to the spectators to land with great force, but those close to the ring could see that they had but little effect. The young parson leaped away out of danger, jumping in and out, landing almost wherever he pleased, tricking his opponent time after time. In the third round Hanson missed a chance for a blow that would have turned the tide of battle, for Webster overbalanced, and as he fell forward the bully shot his right to the jaw, but the blow missed the vital spot, and the parson was saved. The force of the blow was so great, however, that the young man was forced to take the count of eight. In the fourth round, Webster landed a solar plexus and followed it up with a right back-hand smash on the jaw that sent Hanson down for the count of nine. He rose, but was very groggy, and a few seconds later the bell sounded. In the fifth round the parson was still cool and collected, while the other was now trying desperately to stave off defeat. He rushed Webster, who landed on the stomach, eye and mouth in quick succession; Hanson clinched, the young man then upper-cut the fighter on the jaw with a hard left, and, like a flash of lightning, shot over his right in a hard hook to the other side of the jaw. Hanson went down with his body all drawn up—he rolled over on his back and lay there insensible, long after the finish.

With a shout the boys surged into the ring and bore the triumphant Webster away on their shoulders. Nor did his victory end there, for Sunday morning found one and all, even the gun-fanner and the prize-fighter, attentively listening to the parson's first sermon.

"MUTT AND JEFF AND THE GERMAN BAND"

Nestor Release September 2

After the terrible experience with the death-dealing auto, the grafting country judge, the forlorn county jail, etc., etc., Mutt and Jeff were glad to again face the eternal problem of keeping body and soul together.

Being down and out may be a pleasant occupation for some, but somehow or other Mutt and Jeff fail to find it so, One might think they'd rather enjoy the recurring "predicament" and be light-hearted as well as light-pocketed, and yet the lanky fellow and the runty one cannot reconcile themselves to the "mazumaless" state.

They might work for a living, but that would not be in accord with their dignity, nor with their mental equipment. Besides, why work when schemes may work for you? Aye, there's the rub. And no one has a better monopoly on schemes than Mutt, the "wise guy." As for Jeff,—well, the poor little fellow has to be content with being second on the program.

As usual with this twain when on the eve of some great plan, they take a stroll, and this time stroll in the path of a strolling German band. The clarinet, piccolo, the cornet, the sliding trombone, the big bass horn and miscellaneous other brass noise-makers are seen in action—they are also heard by the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, the housewives, the street Arabs, etc., who fire a volley of pennies and nickels at the German players. It must be remembered that "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast."

Eureka! Mutt soon tackles the sliding mysteries of an old sliding trombone and Jeff struggles in the mighty grasp of a dilapidated bass horn. Professor Schmitz, evidently another schemer, claims to teach music in all its ramifications in one lesson. Mutt and Jeff "fall" for this one lesson, and, being matriculated musicians, they make a bid for the people's small change.

Alas! their music is of the highbrowed variety and the ignorant rabble fails to appreciate it. Jeff spies a blind man mechanically turning the crank of what perhaps once was an organ, and sees the "coin" go in the direction of the man who cannot see. If he does not see the money coming, certainly he cannot see it "going." Mutt takes the bull by the horns and expedites matters. The loose change "goes" and the way Mutt and Jeff also go makes a climax that even the blind will see.

"DUTY"

Imp Release Sept. 7

A story of a lighthouse-keeper and his family who did more than their duty to warn vessels of the danger of the shoals.

Homer Gardner, the light keeper, ascends the tower to light his lamps and soon after the mechanism that rotates the tower becomes useless owing to a broken part. Gardner is appalled at the consequences. His wife is ill and he has no one to depend upon except his small son, Willie. Hastily summoning the boy, he assigns him the task of turning the tower while he rows to the mainland in a skiff to obtain repairs to the light. Bidding the child good-bye, and promising to return as soon as possible, he sets forth.

The sea is rough but he makes the first part of his journey without mishap and sets out on the return trip. The ocean is lashed into fury and he runs his boat on a rock, and a plank is splintered. The boat rapidly fills and sinks and he takes to the water and swims in the direction of the light.

The boy becomes exhausted from his long exertion. The mother starts up and, looking out, notices that the light is not reflected seaward. She staggers up the steps, weak and ill, and reaches the summit only to find Willie unconscious in the tower. She looks out upon the water and observes a ship headed for the rocks. Summoning all her strength, she revolves the light and the ship is providentially saved.

Gardner, after a long swim, manages to drag himself up the slippery steps of the lighthouse and with strength that is almost superhuman enters the living-room to find his wife gone. Staggering up the long and tedious stairway, he finds her exhausted but still at her post, turning the light. He hastily repairs the machinery and carries his unconscious wife down the stairs.

Later, the captain of the vessel that was saved by Mrs. Gardner visits the light and presents the husband with a medal. The big-hearted keeper of the light in turn presents it to his companion, the brave woman who kept the light revolving while in an exhausted condition. The captain is surprised but praises the woman, who is happy in the thought that she was of assistance.

"THE HAUNTED HOUSE"

Imp Release September 4

Cabel Davis, a miserly old skinflint, holds a mortgage on a house belonging to Samuel Perkins, and is scheming to buy it cheap. Perkins is poor and has a handsome daughter, Mary. Davis calls and insists on the payment of money due and Perkins tell him he cannot meet the obligation. Davis leaves threatening him.

The old miser conceives a cunning plan to prevent the mortgaged house from being rented and thus depreciate its value, and he makes nocturnal visits to the old house, using a sheet and emitting hideous noises to convince the villagers that the house is haunted. The place is visited by several who go away terror-stricken as the old miser takes a black cat up through the cellarway and shows it through the window. He has the people of the village frightened.

In the meantime, Milton Dawson, a young man, relieves the station agent at the railroad as ticket agent and telegrapher. He meets Mary Perkins and falls in love with her. They have several meetings and he becomes interested in all that concerns her. He learns from the people in the village that the Perkins' house is haunted and scouts the idea. He is more intelligent, and the uncanny tales told him cause smiles. He decides to do a little quiet investigating and trails Davis to the isolated house and sees him enter through the cellar.

Young Dawson has an inkling of the matter, and he follows and sees the old villain drape himself with a sheet and step out on the roof. He follows and finds Davis on the roof with a gaping crowd below, scared out of their wits. The old man appears with the sheet draped about him, the personification of an evil visitor. Dawson steps out and, grabbing him, snatches off the sheet and exposes the fraud to the gaze of those horrified spectators below. Davis is brought down on the sward and confesses his nefarious scheme and is despised of all his neighbors. So penitent is he that he writes a release of the mortgage in the presence of the crowd when in danger of bodily injury. Dawson takes the paper to Perkins and astonishes him by his revelations. He is very grateful and summons Mary and it is all explained to her.

The story can have but one finale. Mary is loud in her praises of the part played by the handsome young telegrapher and is frank to display her gratitude. Dawson is not satisfied with thanks, and takes the shy young girl in his arms and she is not offended.

"INSHAVOGUE"

Yankee Film Co. Release Sept. 4.

Ireland's early battles for freedom never knew a braver nor more picturesque character than Brian Maguire, known as the "Inshavogue." Inshavogue struck terror to the hearts of the enemies of Ireland and was worshipped by Ireland's peasants. In a mountain fortress he defied the entire British Army time and again, and at last, when the struggle for freedom seemed hopeless, the British offered to the Inshavogue the following terms if he would leave Ireland: A pardon for him and his patriots, a large sum of money and land, and a free passage to his newly acquired property in one of the British possessions, but when Inshavogue came among them he was immediately handcuffed, shackled and cast into prison, the British saying that "a word to a traitor need not be kept."

Inshavogue, before his escape into the mountains, left his wife in a peasant's hut, and that same night she gave birth to a baby girl and lost her own life.

On the very same night, Lady Roderick, the owner of the estate gave birth to a baby girl who died almost immediately and the physician in attendance, who had also attended the wife of the Inshavogue, takes the motherless babe of the Inshavogue and changes it for the dead body of Lady Roderick's child. The child grows to beautiful girlhood as the daughter of Lord and Lady Roderick. At her eighteenth birthday she is told her true history, and through the knavery of Sir Francis, a disappointed suitor, she meets her father. Inshavogue, when he realizes that the girl is truly his daughter, proclaims himself to the peasants and patriots of Ireland.

He is cast into prison and is eventually pardoned through the influence of Lord and Lady Roderick.

He is pardoned in time to witness the wedding of his daughter to the man of her choice.

"FADED ROSES"

Yankee Film Co. Release Sept. 8

Two country boys answer their country's call and go to the front in the great battle between the North and South. Jack West, the younger of the two, dearly loves the village belle, Bessie Brooks, but being of a bashful nature he is unable to declare his love even at such a critical time; still he is eager to let her know of his love and he sends her a bouquet of flowers within which he encloses a note declaring his love and begs her to send back by messenger one of the flowers, which will signify that she returns his love. Bessie receives the bouquet, but does not see the note and tells the messenger there is no answer. Jack eagerly awaits the return of the messenger with the token and when the boy returns empty-handed he leaves for the front, a broken-hearted man.

Thirty years later they meet again, she a spinster, and he a bachelor. Jack, now a Colonel in the Union Army, asks her why she refused his love thirty years ago. Bessie professes ignorance of any love declaration, and the Colonel recalls the incident of the note in the bouquet. Bessie leaves the room and returns with a box which she tells him has never been opened and contains the bouquet sent to her at that time. Together they open the box and amidst the faded leaves there lies the note proclaiming Jack's love. Although thirty years later, Bessie gives her lover a satisfactory answer.

"MESMERIZING MOE"

Yankee Film Co. Release Sept. 8

Two jovial sportsmen, after a successful day of fishing, come upon old Uncle Moe, tight asleep with a fishing pole in hand, and hook and line in the water. They decided upon having some fun with the old negro, and working silently they remove his line from the water and, attaching a large fifteen-pound fish to his hook, they throw it into the pond, in the meantime hiding, to see the result of their little joke. Uncle Moe is awakened by the jerk and imagine his surprise when he pulls out a whooping large fish. Chuckling with delight at his apparent success, he goes to another part of the stream. As he leaves the spot the two jokers appear and, detaching the big fish from the line, replace it with a very small one. When Uncle Moe returns with a very small fish he had caught at the other part of the stream and goes to put it on his line, imagine his surprise when he draws forth a small fish in place of the large one he had left there. Uncle Moe begins to imagine he is seeing things, and decides to change his location again. Taking the two small fish, he ties them together, examines them critically and drops them into the water, after having secured the end of the string to a rock.

When he returns the jokers had already been at work and when he draws up the string he finds two fifteen-pounders in place of the two little ones he had left there. Uncle Moe decides not to take any further chances and, shouldering the fish, he hobbles towards his hut in the hills. This is more than the jokers bargained for and in order to obtain their own fish they are compelled to buy them from Uncle Moe for an exorbitant price.

"GRANT AND LINCOLN"

Champion Release, Sept. 4

George Wharton leaves his Southern home to fight for the North. While in camp he chastises a fellow officer for insulting a lady, and thereby gains his enmity. George's sister has a sweetheart, who is a Confederate officer, Robert E. Lee. He was now a prisoner in the Union camp, and therefore when Martha wrote a letter to her brother, George, she enclosed a note to Robert E. Lee, a namesake of the famous General Lee.

George gets his mail, but unfortunately drops the letter to Lee, which falls into the hands of his enemy. The latter, suspecting treason, opens it in his own tent, only to find a harmless missive. Notwithstanding, he forges an incriminating letter, supposedly for Gen. Robert E. Lee, and places it in the original envelope, laying it where George will find it. With this accomplished, George is arrested through his enemy's connivance, and tried and condemned.

The lad now sends a note to his sweetheart, the girl he had saved from insult, and she informs his sister. His sweetheart attempts an audience with Grant, but with no avail. Before this took place, the Confederate officer had escaped and Union soldiers were after him hot foot.

Meanwhile, George's sister also arrives, and is also refused the pardon by General Grant. She desperately snatches a revolver from the belt of his servant and forces the General, at its point, to gant her request. Imagine both the tragic and ridiculous situation! The girl now dashes off to headquarters at City Point, Va., and tells her story to Lincoln. Just then the Confederate officer, who had been recaptured, is brought in and he verifies her story. The pardon is granted.

While George's sweetheart is strenuously holding up the villainous officer at the point where the condemned youth is to die, his sister rides up furiously with Lincoln's pardon and matters are put to rights. In the latter connection a double union takes place, and four young people reap their reward.

"WHEN THE LAW CAME"

Champion Release, Sept. 6

The opening scene deals with a wild and woolly town in which the "Vigilante Committee" is largely in evidence and "Judge Lynch" is all paramount. But civilization was reaching out with a tamer's arm in the persons of judge and lawyer. When the serene-looking Judge pinned the badge of sheriff on big Dave Hopkins the crowd enjoyed the occasion as a huge joke, and piled into Gorman's saloon to "liquor up" on the head of it.

Now, it wasn't long before the new arm of justice was put to a test, and a severe test it was. Jasper Jones was a brute in his liquor cups, and at such times he would beat his child, a sweet baby girl of four. Handsome Dave Marron was big and strong, and one day, being attracted by the cries of the little one, he arrived just in time to prevent the father's brutality himself laying over the father's shoulders the black snake whip with right good will.

The fellow squirmed and writhed in agony as the castigation was given, and when Dave had departed Jones swore a terrible vengeance against him; but as he held and fingered the trigger of his gun it suddenly went off and he fell in the throes of death.

Now, upon the arrival of Dave, the little one had crept under the cot, and when the parent fell dead she came forth and wildly fled in terror from the house, finding refuge with the Governor's daughter, Bertha Pierson.

News of Jones' death soon circulated, and the Judge was soon on the spot, together with the Sheriff and Dave Marron. Dave, of course, was innocent, but as he had fought with the man, the Judge suspected him. Then the Sheriff had to arrest him, both thinking it was a huge joke. But the joke simmered down. A jury was sworn in. They were instructed to act on the evidence. Dave was adjudged guilty, and sentenced to death.

Dave had a sweetheart, the Governor's daughter, Bertha. Fate ordained that she should learn from the little baby girl how her father died. Bertha had cared for the child. She hastily sought her father and obtained a pardon. A trusty cowpuncher undertook to deliver it. Thus it came about that as the drop was about to be sprung by Dave's friend, the Sheriff, the messenger dashed up with the paper of freedom, and Dave's life was saved.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A COAT"

Eclair Release September 4

Mr. Maurice goes away on a journey. His wife takes advantage of his absence to invite his friend, Henry Baitup, to spend the evening. The maid employs the services of Charles (a species of panhandler) in delivering the note, and Charles profits by his visit to such an extent that he returns to Mr. Baitup's apartments in the evening and succeeds in donning a suit of clothes which fits him perfectly. Dressed in borrowed plumage, Charles struts among his friends in favorite haunts, and incidentally passed unmolested into the ballroom of a neighbor of Mrs. Maurice, whose apartment joins that of her friend who is giving the dance. Charles makes a tour of exploration, and crossing a balcony enters the apartment of Mrs. Maurice. Unaware of the presence of Henry and Lucy (Mrs. Maurice), Charles plies his trade. The noise disturbs the couple, who think it is the husband. In a short time the husband does return, and Charles, disturbed at his work, throws off Henry's coat—the coat is left behind. The police are called and find in the pocket of the coat the card of Mr. Henry Baitup. Henry is arrested, brought back, and accused. Then the butler and valet bring in the real culprit, Charles, having prevented the panhandler's escape. The real burglar is apprehended, and the anxious lover freed from his embarrassing predicament.

"THE FOUNDLING"

Great Northern Release Sept. 2

The poor mother cannot support her babe, and leaves it on the wayside, where it is found by a young couple, who take it home and nurture it in luxury. Their fondness for the foundling causes jealousy, and two members of the family plan to have the infant kidnapped. Meanwhile the mother has been engaged as nurse to her own child. She is loved by John, who delivers the mail to the house, and he proposes marriage to her, but she declines to wed and once more leave her child. The jealous members of the family enlist the services of a gipsy, who carries off the child. The mother is distracted. A chase ensues, and the woman's lover tracks down the gipsy and the child is recovered. The complicity of the other members of the family is discovered, and denouement speedily follows. In the end, the young mother is happily married to John.

"THE DOORKEEPER"

Ambrosio Release August 30

The old doorkeeper has a weakness for cards, and while engrossed in his game forgets his duties. The tenants of the building, unable to secure admittance to their apartments, finally locate him and succeed in instilling in him a sense of his obligations. On the same reel is

"Tweedledum's White Suit."

Tweedledum wears a white suit and is caught in the rain. He stubbornly proceeds on his way and encounters so many accidents that he is forced to return home in a pitiful state.

THE CRUSADERS

Or JERUSALEM DELIVERED

(Copyright, 1911, World's Best Film Co.)

THIS MAGNIFICENT MOVING PICTURE PRODUCTION IS ABSOLUTELY INDEPENDENT! Purchasers of state rights may show it in any independent theatre, any church, any hall, any club, any college, any school, ANYWHERE in the states they purchase, WITHOUT PAYING A "LICENSE" FEE TO ANYONE or without asking any one's permission. It is endorsed by police censors and by the church. It is about the only great film which has no objectionable features whatsoever!

IMMEDIATE RETURNS ON YOUR MONEY!

THE MEN WHO BOUGHT THE ILLINOIS STATE RIGHTS FOR "THE CRUSADERS, OR JERUSALEM DELIVERED," inform us that they WILL HAVE ALL THEIR INVESTMENT BACK BY THE END OF SEPTEMBER! They have two copies (3,500 feet each) booked solidly through September and October. They are now considering the purchase of more states! We could have sold the rights to nearly every state in the Union by this time if we had been willing to cut our prices. But the prices are already the lowest on record for a film production of such magnitude. DON'T DICKER! Buy the states you want right now and get your fall and winter booking in work! The fact that this film is INDEPENDENT increases its value and possibilities for you by at least one hundred per cent.! Imagine what it means to own the state rights to the best film ever made, AND HAVE ABSOLUTELY NO COMPETITION! Imagine what you could have done under the same circumstances with Pathe's great "Passion Play." AND "THE CRUSADERS, OR JERUSALEM DELIVERED," is infinitely greater because it offends no creed or sect!

POSTERS! HERALDS! BANNERS! DODGERS!

WORLD'S BEST FILM CO.
"Feature Films & Nothing Else"
CHICAGO

We have issued the most beautiful and striking 8-sheet posters ever used in the moving picture business. Also high-class one-sheets, upright and flat. In fact we have prepared everything for you. All you have to do is to BUY YOUR STATE RIGHTS and then attend to your bookings. Exhibitors everywhere are wild to book it. Opportunity is hammering at your door. Are you going to do anything about it? First come, first served!

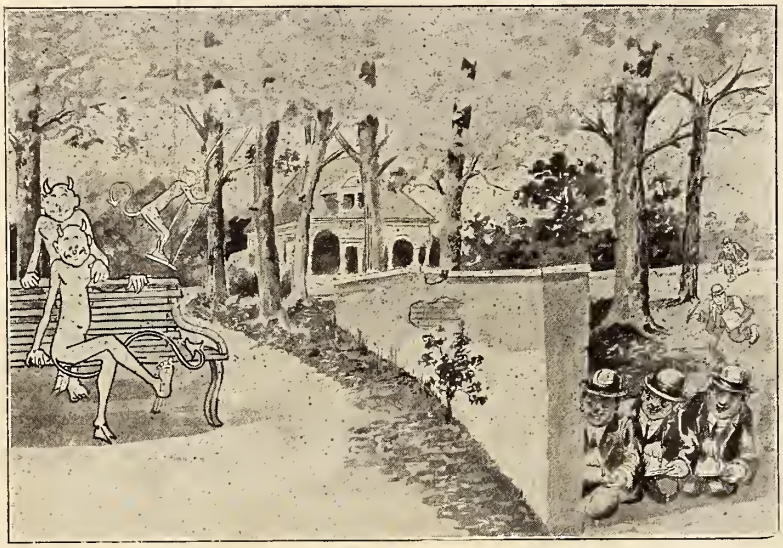
IMPS ARE COPIED UNsuccessfully



They copy Imp plots. They copy Imp posters. They copy Imp ads. They copy Imp lobby displays. But they CAN'T copy that indescribable SOMETHING that makes an Imp an Imp. You've noticed it scores of times. You've talked about it. All of which is proof that you can't get Imp quality unless you get Imp films. If you can't get Imps any other way, pay a little more film rental and get a contract specifying that your service will include TWO IMPS A WEEK WITHOUT FAIL! Tell your exchange you're willing to pay a little extra to be sure of getting TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK. You'll get quick action. And you'll get big returns! Try it!

THOSE 10,000 SUBSCRIPTIONS

ARE you one? If not, why not? The offer was very plain, reasonable, and concise, and we want every man in the moving picture industry to become a subscriber to the News, of which it has been said by a writer sending in his subscription: "Your paper is the only paper in the industry from which I can learn the true facts concerning anything I want to know. I read every other paper, but I get more news, more real information, from the Moving Picture News, which is worth to me in dollars and cents a pretty large sum. I have therefore the greatest of pleasure in handing you this subscription."

The Moving Picture News is quoted in every paper the world over, and if you want to be in touch with a real live wire you must get the News.

Principals of schools, both public and high, are asking news agents all over the country for the News. At state conventions of teachers, summer schools and Chautauquas, the News has been quoted for its educational advance in moving pictures. The News has the endorsement of Senators and Representatives at Washington, Senators and Assemblymen at the State Capitols. Our policy has been one of advancement and progress along educational paths. We have refused hundreds of dollars in advertisements, because we would not mislead our readers by allowing fake and dubious announcements to be made in our columns. We have reached such a standard of fame that all shyster concerns do not bother us any more. We look after our readers' interests and we give them the facts; we give as far as it is possible on this mundane sphere, the truth, and the whole truth, so that our readers may be guided and guarded. That is why we want your subscription so that we can be in the position where we ought to be in your interests, viz., circulating through the whole 14 000 names identified in the industry that we have in our possession. Ten thousand subscribers will help us get this position and the offer is still open for the remainder of the year. Twenty-five cents for four months.

We are preparing interesting articles and are in touch with some of the best and the highest educational institutions in the country. Information will appear in the News and nowhere else, so send in your twenty-five cents, and if at the end of the year we have not given you that value, ask us and we will return your money.

OUR ARTIST'S IDEA OF UNCLE SAM AND THE NEWS

MOVING PICTURES AND NARROW-MINDED PREJUDICES

By A. L. Barrett

The principal charge against the moving pictures is that they teach boys how to become experts in robbery, burglary and other crimes, how to elude the police, and by regular attendance at this famous school, how they can finally become eligible for the penitentiary, although not necessarily occupants. Girls, say these accusers, can learn how to deceive their parents, and, later on, their husbands, or they can see the rapid progress between an ordinary flirtation and the world of Bohemia or worse, which, of course, is only pictured as a world of unthinking pleasure and a round of continuous gayety, sure to appeal to any young person. The picture plays have, in fact, been accused of being one of the best schools for criminals that has ever been established, and the rate of admission being so exceedingly nominal places it within the reach of all. This reputation has been gained simply by reason of some of the plays that were originally presented, and it will take years to live it down completely. It was a reputation, however, that was never fully deserved, for there have always been many good plays on the screens, and in most cases the very persons who make the above charges are those who have never seen a moving picture play, during the past ten years, and it is during this time that the improvement has been instituted.

As a general rule, however, it will be found that these persons have never been to even one moving picture theater, their defence being that they would not be seen inside such places under any circumstances, as they are resorts for the ignorant and vicious only, and this statement, despite the fact that thousands of eminently respectable, refined and educated persons from any community are continually attending these performances. They also charge the motion pictures with being entirely opposed to all religious influences, although a very casual glance at the programs advertised in front of the theaters would prove that religious plays are daily increasing in number and popularity and frequented by a proportionately augmented audience, drawn from the ranks of the church-going public. They also declare that the reason the plays have vicious tendencies and suggestions and are entirely unfit for presentation at least to the younger portion of the community, is because all the managers are simply in for as much money as they can make out of it and are men of depraved characters and the worst reputations, notwithstanding that the majority of these managers are men of good moral character and in many instances have lived in the same neighborhood for years, being looked upon with favor by their present denunciators until they opened a moving picture show, and who are of a decidedly superior clay to the ordinary saloon-keeper, for instance. The people making these wholesale charges usually terminate their tirades with the time-worn exclamation, "Why, I would not be seen in such a place for anything."

And this is one of the strangest contradictions of human nature—the very persons who have the least personal or practical knowledge of a subject are listened to with the most confidence. The prejudice against the moving pictures, like any other, is difficult to eradicate simply on account of this narrowness of conception common to so many persons who do not trouble themselves to make a little personal investigation. The ordinary person usually obtains a little hearsay information, with very, very little, but as a rule, absolutely no practical experience, and from this little second-hand knowledge, proceeds to argue the pros and cons of a most important question and, without further investigation, reduce it to a theory which he publishes on every occasion possible as gospel truth and a prejudice is established which frequently does untold harm. Such people are somewhat similar to Mayne Reid's much reviled closet naturalists who, he declared, studied zoology in their own homes by means of purchased specimens and never went to jungle or forest to study animal life in its natural environs, but nevertheless, gave the knowledge so obtained to a confiding world with as much assurance as if they had actually lived in close vicinity to the animals whose habits they were supposed to be studying.

The persons with a prejudice do exactly the same thing. For instance, many persons who are agnostic or atheistic in their views will hold forth very learnedly on the uselessness of church, Sunday-school, parish house, or religion in any form, will describe the Bible as a collection of silly stories written chiefly by a set of fanatics and religious enthusiasts, à la Dowie et al, of modern days, and the remainder by a number of ignorant fishermen, publicans, and those engaged in similar homely occupations. If, however, they are asked to relate a certain incident narrated in the Bible, or even to state when or where it occurred, the almost invariable answer will be that they really cannot say exactly, as they have not opened a Bible for years. If asked to state specifically the church in their own locality which is harmful or even useless, and why, they will usually answer: "Oh, I don't know much about individual churches, you know, why, I haven't been inside one for years."

Then there are others who can see nothing but unmitigated evil in a theater, who cannot see the art, beauty and uplifting tendencies of the drama, notwithstanding some expression of it has been demanded since the first evidences of culture or the refined pleasures of life were apparent. Even little children like to "pretend" and have mimic plays of their own, continually living over again, and embellishing little scenes that are enacted in their everyday life, yet in spite of this natural instinct evident wherever children and young people are found, many narrow-minded, prejudiced persons would have the drama abolished because some persons connected with the profession choose to lower its standards or because of the unfortunate ending of some stage-struck country youth or maiden, which has come before their notice. After indulging in a wholesale denunciation of the entire theatrical profession, they will usually close their interesting remarks by declaring that they would not enter a theater under any circumstances, evidently considering this assertion as an undoubted proof of their thorough knowledge of the subject.

(To be continued next week)

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

On another page appears a clipping from Buffalo Commercial, and when we tell our readers that the proprietor of the Chicago firm is William M. Selig, we are sure nothing but congratulations will go to him for the great advance and the big scoop he has obtained. Now that all details are out, we may say that for the past ten or twelve weeks we have had full knowledge of this enterprising firm's negotiations with "the powers" at Washington. We wanted to publish it then, but our friend William Selig asked us to keep out of print all matters relating to it, and acting upon his request, we have done so. We hope to give a full interview with William M. Selig in an early issue of the News.

Frankford, Pa.—Plans have been prepared for a new moving picture theater at 3139-3149 Frankford avenue for the Alleghany Amusement Co.

ORIGIN AND WORK OF THE NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP

By Margaret I. MacDonald

A CONDITION creates a necessity; and in the lap of necessity germinate and develop the seeds of the curative. Likewise did the arrival of a certain unhealthy condition of affairs in connection with the production and exhibition of moving pictures create a necessity from which originated the National Board of Censorship.

Prior to the decisive step taken by Mayor MacClellan on Christmas Day, 1909, of closing the motion picture theaters of New York City, matters had been going from bad to worse, many of the films shown being of such an objectionable character that the influence of the motion picture hung like a black, menacing cloud over the moral interests of the American family.

The effect of this procedure caused more or less of a panic among the exhibitors, and in March, 1909, a committee of the Association of Exhibitors of New York City called on the People's Institute, which is an institution organized for the protection of family interests, asking for advice regarding the situation, and the best method of procedure to allay the disturbance. The advice given pointed to the creation of an unofficial board of censorship, on the initiative of the People's Institute, as the best means of meeting the situation. Recognizing what would be the value of such an organization as a protection not only to the exhibitor but to the public at large, the suggestion was acted upon, and an agreement entered into by which the Exhibitors' Association was to meet the executive expenses of the proposed board of censorship for an experimental period. In sequence to the above proceedings, it being impossible for the censoring committee to inspect pictures in the four hundred moving picture shows of the city, the Board of Censorship called upon the manufacturers, offering to inspect their product before it was placed on the New York market, and to notify them of any objection, thus placing them in a position to rectify or withdraw the objectionable product before an embarrassing situation, or loss of reputation was reached by attempting to place in the theaters films which had been condemned by the Board of Censorship, and which would therefore be refused by the exhibitors. Most of the manufacturers entered very heartily into this arrangement, and but a short time had elapsed before more than two-thirds of all the manufacturers requested the Board of Censorship to extend its jurisdiction and pass upon the motion picture product of the entire country.

The result and beneficial influence of this National Board of Censorship on the entire country is beyond estimate, since, in the brief period of its existence, up to date, it has been instrumental in keeping off the market at the very least 2 000 000 feet of objectionable film, representing a loss of $200,000 to the manufacturers.

The motion picture manufacturer has learned to look upon the National Board of Censorship as an important unit in a successful outcome of the motion picture business. The co-operation of both manufacturer and exhibitor with the Board of Censorship is a most significant sign of the times—an obvious omen of a millennial future, when "man's inhumanity to man," as regards the perpetrating on the public of morally destructive influences, will be a thing of the past.

Although the National Board of Censorship has had its origin in New York City, and still pursues its good offices in this Eastern metropolis, there are also some local censorship boards at work throughout the country. San Francisco has an official body of voluntary members, headed by the mayor, who inspect the pictures which are shown in that city; Portland, Oregon, has an advisory committee for the same purpose, and Chicago has a representation from the police force of the city for the purpose of controlling the moral atmosphere of the picture houses there.

Nevertheless, there is bound to be a certain contradictory element prevailing, and I cannot but think that by leaving the matter entirely in the hands of the National Board more efficient work could be done. It is estimated that 99 per cent. of all the pictures publicly exhibited in America are passed upon by the National Board of Censorship before being placed upon the market. The National Board of Censorship also employs detectives who are sent about through the country to ascertain whether or not the advice of the board has been satisfactorily carried out. As the board is not an official one, it is merely a matter of honor between the board and the manufacturers as to whether the judgment of the Censorship Board be final. Any picture which has been condemned by the National Board of Censorship is supposed to have had final judgment, and cannot, therefore, be passed upon by any of the local boards. If it is found that a manufacturer has disobeyed the orders of the Board in placing on the market a condemned film, the exhibitors throughout the country are immediately notified to the effect that the National Board of Censorship is no longer responsible for his man's product. From this time on their judgment of his work is withdrawn, and his reputation as a producer practically ruined; the exhibitor in nine cases out of ten will not purchase his product for fear of the contamination of his own business interests.

The censuring committee of the National Board of Censorship is composed of voluntary members from among intelligent people of various professions: Doctors, lawyers, teachers, writers and other entirely disinterested individuals constituting same.

Sometimes a picture is objected to because of one particular scene, whereupon it is passed with the provisory that the manufacturer either cut the scene entirely or substitute another of a different character. When the moral character of a picture is very bad, a circumstance which rarely happens now, the manufacturer is then requested to destroy it altogether. In case of a disagreement on the part of the censuring committee with regard to the moral qualifications of the picture, the question is passed upward to the Governing Board, where it is finally settled.

Pictures are criticized from a purely moral standpoint, the artistic part being left to take care of itself. And it must be admitted that the artistic portion of the moving picture is rapidly improving through the employment of more efficient and artistic directors. It has been said that should the pictures be criticised from a purely artistic standpoint the immorality of the picture would disappear. However true this might be with regard to adults, I fear the method would not pass muster in the case of children. In this country there are about 10,000 motion picture theaters, which are attended daily by from 500 000 to 600,000 children, therefore the problem laid before the Board of Censorship is a deep one. The thousand and one different viewpoints from which a picture can be criticized make it an exceedingly difficult matter for a number of people of diversified opinions to come to a definite and satisfactory conclusion with regard to pictures in which occurs any questionable element at all.

The funds for operation of the National Board of Censorship have been provided largely by the trade interests. "It (the Board of Censorship) is administered through the People's Institute of New York, and financed by the People's Institute through contributions from the general public, but mainly from the motion picture interests themselves." So said the educational secretary of the Board of Censorship before the Child Welfare Conference at Worcester, Mass., June, 1910. And again from "The Gospel of the Kingdom," February, 1911, article by the educational secretary of the National Board of Censorship: "It is interesting to note that contributions of money from the moving picture trade itself into the general funds of the People's Institute have been sufficient to meet the actual expenses of the work during most of the time since it has been founded." From the statement of receipts and disbursements made to the Board of Censorship by the People's Institute: "Since June 8th, 1909, the People's Institute has received in contributions for motion picture work a total of $9,900.

"The People's Institute administered direct the finances of the Censorship from June 8, 1909, to December 31, 1909. Since January 1, 1910, the Board of Censorship has administered its own finances."

It is estimated that from the general fund of the People's Institute there has been paid out $4,000 for administrative services. This has not been charged up to the Board of Censorship, but on the contrary represents a minimum estimate of the contribution of the People's Institute to the Board of Censorship.

It is a most commendable fact that so much voluntary service has been rendered unremunerated in connection with the censorship work. To be sure here is plenty of interesting work for the philanthropist, but it must also be remembered that many of those who have so willingly given their time and services free, are people to whom time undoubtedly means money, therefore they are doubly commendable. "The censorship is simply by agreement," says The Outlook of June 24, 1911, "but its work is rigorous and effective. About four thousand distinct film subjects are passed upon annually. This means daily work for someone, and hours each day. It is undertaken by the censoring committee appointed by the Board of Censorship, which has thirty members, ladies and gentlemen who give time and labor without compensation in money or praise, and the three secretaries being the only representatives of the board in receipt of salary."

The names of the secretaries of the National Board of Censorship are as follows: Mr. John Collier, educational secretary; Mr. Walter Storey, general secretary; and Mr. Lewis A. Hopkins, assistant secretary.

The total expenditure of the Board of Censorship from January 1, 1910, to January 1, 1911, for salaries and incidentals amounted to $4630.50, leaving a balance in the bank of $1,108.97. The expenditures for January, February and March, 1911, were $1,516.02, leaving a balance on hand, including checks not deposited, of $942.95.

There is room for a good work here, and room for contributions and helpful suggestions by those interested in philanthropic work. The artistic quality of the motion picture is a matter of evolution. Just as development has followed development in other lines of art, so will the artistic element in the motion picture grow and develop. So far as the artistic is concerned, the public are bound to be the critics: their verdict is final. Therefore, upon the evolution of the appreciation of art in the public mind rests the possibility of the evolution of the motion picture in an artistic sense. And the motion picture can be made the largest factor in the artistic education of the people extant to-day.

That the trade itself has been practically the source of the foundation of one of the most useful institutions of which the country can boast, seems to me to be one of the most remarkable steps taken in the annals of trade. It marks an important era in the moral history of man.

"THE JAMES BOYS IN MISSOURI"

In last week's issue in commenting upon films of the above character we wrote: "Again suggestion is being made by, we believe, manufacturers not connected with either of the parties at present marketing films, who are anxiously desirous of bringing out a re-issue of the 'James Boys' of Missouri, train wrecking, and the desecration of the home life. We sincerely trust that every exchange man will raise a voice of protest against such subjects being inflicted upon them, and if they do not, let the exhibitors lead, and issue a strong protest against such subjects being thrust upon them, and we will give all of the publicity they desire.

"Surely out of some two thousand writers of film stories, the business can obtain good records and stories, meeting with the full approval of any censor board. Let us have the highest, the best, and the cleanest and not take a retrograde step, giving parsons and such like ilk another handle with which to rap the motion picture industry."

What was our astonishment on returning from Chicago, to find an advertisement in a certain house organ that this film was being advertised and released. We again cry "Shame!" and sincerely hope that every Censorship Board throughout the country will bar and ban this disgusting subject. If the authorities in every city will do as they are going to do in New York, we feel sure that very little more will be heard or seen of films of this nature.

A prominent woman worker for the amelioration and uplifting of humanity called our attention to the matter and we asked her to put her ideas to us in the form of a letter, and in it will be found her views, with which we are in full and hearty accord, and we hope every mother in the land will do her utmost to prevent the exhibition of this film. Let the suffragists, the Women's League of Clubs, the W. C. T. U., mother's meetings of every denomination rise up in one vigorous, powerful protest against polluting their children's minds with these films, which ought to be relegated only to stag parties and not promiscuously to exhibitors.

N.B.—Exchanges. Do not mistake the name of the company for the one in New York. We understand there is no connection.

Our Chicago Correspondent

Writes:—Had an interview with Mr. Gilmore, of the Ideal Theater, last evening. He stated that there was nothing of particular interest except that the different exhibitors in Illinois had a special invitation from Mr. Selig to inspect his plant. There were 222 in all. They left the Masonic Temple in thirty-nine automobiles, all decorated with signs of their profession. While inspecting the plant they took part in a mob scene in "The Run on the Bank." Outlining it briefly, a circus had come to town with its lemonade and peanut stands, etc., and the farmers wishing to obtain some money to spend at the circus all made a grand rush for the bank, but turned to flee at the appearance of a large lion in the bank. After inspecting the plant they were all entertained by Mr. Selig at a genuine "Dutch luncheon," which after their tour of the plant was certainly relished and welcomed by all. The good feeling and joviality demonstrated by every one showed that they had all spent a most pleasant and delightful afternoon. This is the first time in the history of the Moving Picture News that exhibitors have been invited to inspect a plant. Over ninety per cent had never before been in a plant, and consequently were both surprised and enlightened when interesting facts that were unknown to them before were revealed. It would be a fine thing for the operators to learn of the great care and pains that are taken to make a film, for then perhaps they would appreciate the fact that it is very necessary to handle these films carefully.

"THE JAMES BOYS IN MISSOURI"

From a Woman's Standpoint

Needless to make any explanatory remarks regarding the moral character of the above film which, as every American citizen, and, in fact, many who are not American citizens, will recognize by title as portraying the disgraceful lawlessness of a family of robbers, train wreckers, and altogether undesirable individuals.

Why is it that, in addition to the already great amount of harmful influence which has been for years contaminating the minds of American youths, through the medium of manifold dime novels with this subject as their principal theme, we should have forced upon us in this age of intelligence and advanced theories of education, such a film as the above?

Some twenty or thirty years ago we might have tolerated it, but not to-day. We propose a forward movement, not a backward one, and we are not willing to endanger the moral development of our children, let alone the development of the Nation's children by placing them in contact with a living moving picture of the transactions of the most lawless band of robbers that America has ever known. As this is a feature film, and not, therefore, under the jurisdiction of the National Board of Censorship, it appears to me to be a condition which will cause to be felt the necessity of organizing local boards of censorship to deal with matters such as the above.

This film of a disgraceful theme, a menace to order, and an incentive to lawlessness should be allowed to exist only long enough for the completion of its destruction. I am sure that this would be the sentiment of all American mothers were they asked to express themselves on the subject.

CLIO AND PHYLETES

This new Itala masterpiece, which will be released on Saturday, September 2d, through the New York Motion Picture Co., will be awaited with much interest and will no doubt equal if not surpass their famous "Fall of Troy."

It is produced on the same scale of magnificence and splendor with splendid acting and fine stage settings.

In order that our readers may become better acquainted with the story we present the full synopsis:

The Story

The warrior Phyletes falls in love with the fair Clio, and after strenuous wooing secures her promise to marry him. Her father, King Dyomedes, forbids the marriage, but is finally won over by the lovers.

The barbarian ruler, King Haxar, who is an ally of Dyomedes, comes on a visit, accompanied by his retinue. Clio, as mistress of her father's palace, proves a charming hostess, and her dazzling beauty wins the heart of the barbarian, and he asks her father for her hand. Dyomedes informs him that Clio is already betrothed, and King Haxar, flushed with wine from the sumptuous banquet, tries to persuade Phyletes to free the girl from her promise. A bitter quarrel takes place, and King Dyomedes invites his rude guest to leave the palace. He retires with bad grace, in an ugly mood, determined to wipe out what he considers an insult.

The Attack

He marshals his warriors, and is next seen moving swiftly toward the town. A shepherd watching his herd is the first to sight the approaching forces, and runs swiftly to the palace. Quick preparations are made to repel the invaders, the gates of the town being securely fastened. For a large amount of gold, however, one of the guardians of the gates proves a traitor, and Haxar's warriors are soon within the walls.

A desperate conflict ensues, the barbarians fighting with savage fury. King Dyomedes falls, crushed to the earth by force of numbers. At length the palace is stormed, where Clio is anxiously watching the scene of carnage. Haxar makes her a prisoner, and compels her to attend a feast of the victorious barbarians.

In the meantime Phyletes has heroically borne the body of the wounded Dyomedes to safety, and stealthily approaching the palace he mounts the wall, looking into the window. The sight that greets him wrings his heart with pain, for the barbarian is forcing Clio to submit to his caresses. Frenzied by his inability to rescue her he determines that death shall free her from Haxar, and making his way to the palace vaults he arranges a huge pile of straw and wood, over which he pours some oil and applies a light.

Great Fire Scene

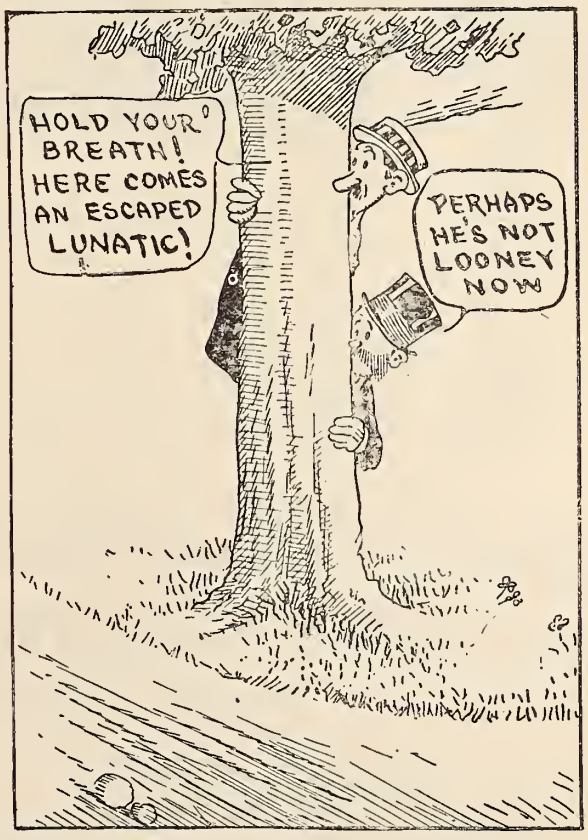
In a few moments the roaring flames are sweeping through the palace, and the merry-makers flee indiscriminately. The dazed Haxar tarries behind with Clio, and Phyletes rushing into the room snatches a heavy vase with which he lays low the savage king.

Through the crackling fire and rolling smoke Phyletes leads Clio through the halls. Haxar, recovering his senses, pursues the lovers and brings them to bay. In terrible fear of again falling into the hands of Haxar, Clio begs Phyletes to plunge a dagger in her heart. While Phyletes is nerving himself for the deed the palace comes crashing down upon the barbarians, and while they are buried under the debris Clio and Phyletes reach the hiding place of Dyomedes, where they are safe from harm.

Bromberg and Peck in Town

A. C. Bromberg, Atlanta manager of the Consolidated Film and Supply Co., and W. H. Peck, manager of the supply department of said concern, were in town last week. Two cleaner, brighter and handsomer young men will be hard to find and we were exceedingly glad to renew the old and delightful acquaintance. Messrs. Bromberg and Peck went everywhere and visited everybody and enjoyed themselves immensely. They were particularly anxious to see Mutt and Jeff at work in the Nestor laugh factory, and, escorted by David Horsley, they journeyed to the Nestor studio at Mariner Harbor, Staten Island, where they spent the most eventful and enjoyable day of their New York trip.

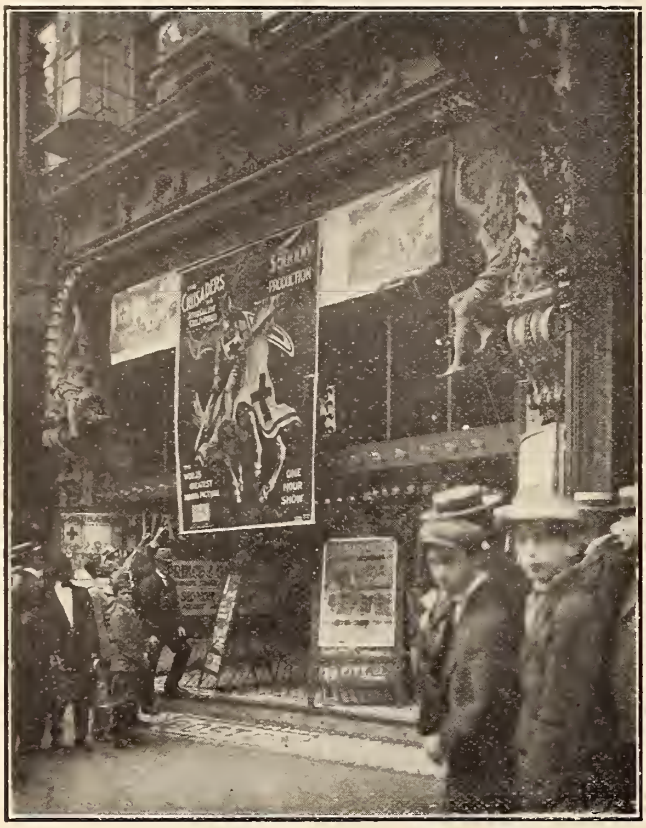
Apropos, the Mutt and Jeff release of Saturday, September 9th, is "Mutt and Jeff and the Escaped Lunatic," a cartoon of which is herewith shown.



After what we said in our last issue about "Mutt and Jeff and the German Band," we can only add that, if anything, this coming Mutt and Jeff photo-farce is even snappier, better and more finished than any of its predecessors. If Mutt and Jeff spin laughs with tick-a-tick regularity, how much will an escaped lunatic? No, dear children, this is not a joke, but simply an index to the fun and laughter created by Mutt and Jeff and the escaped lunatic.

Tom Quill Scores a Great Hit with State Rights for "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered"

Tom Quill, manager of the World's Best Film Company, received a wire from Julius Stern, who is handling "The Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" for the Missouri State Rights Company of Kansas City. Singer's report shows 18,000 paid admission in six days for "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" in one of the large theaters in Kansas City.



A TYPICAL "CRUSADERS" DISPLAY

Mr. Quill's office in Chicago is drawing great crowds. The exhibitors and state right buyers all over the country are trying to book the "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered." He is busy shaking hands with all of them and getting their money, as his states are selling very fast. He claims that by the first of October every state in the United States, every province in Canada, and all the American possessions will be sold, as the state rights buyers up to this time say they are making big profits.

It looked like a regular riot to see the people on Dearborn street, Chicago, Monday, hurrying into the Boyce Building and cramming into the elevators to see Tom Quill.

He has sold Illinois, Indiana, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Missouri, Wisconsin, Arkansas, Ohio and the Philippine Islands, and has several deposits on other states that may be sold at any hour. He states that anybody who was in the market for the state right for "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" should not lose any time, and also that throughout the country he has persuaded the different exchanges to organize state feature companies to handle the "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" and for his coming feature film which will be the talk of the world. Every one now buying "Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered" will have first option on all of his coming feature films.

Keep it up, Tom; good luck, old boy! You've got the World's Best Film Company known all over the world in record breaking time.

Mr. Arthur A. Schmidt

That perpetually energetic manager of the Victor Film Service, Buffalo, Mr. Arthur A. Schmidt, has been in town again, and, as usual, so busy as to just about have had time for a hearty handshake and a cheery how-de-do.

Joseph Hopp

Joseph Hopp, president Standard Film Exchange, who owns the exclusive rights for the special feature films in three reels entitled "Temptations of a Great City" to the states of Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan, reports big demand for the films. Mr. Hopp has sub-let his rights to Michigan to Salling & Riggs, of Grayling, Michigan.

Bert Adler and Charlie Simone on the Sick List

What's the matter with film advertising, anyhow? Evidently the grinding out of film ads week after week is not conducive to good health. It seems to get on one's nerves as the recent malady of Bert Adler shows. Young Adler has been confined to his bed for the past week with an aggravated case of "nerves" and fever. He is reported improving and we expect to see him soon as lively as of yore.

Charlie Simone, who positively dislikes to play second fiddle, and who wants to be more than George Washington ever was, to wit, first in war, first in peace, first in publicity, first in health, first in illness—first in everything,—has just retired from the field of activities to quietly nurse a complication of ills, which we know cannot keep down active little fellows of the lively Charlie Simone brand.

Again we ask: What's the matter with film advertising?

Milwaukee, Wis.—An addition will be built to the Elite Theater at Green Bay and Auer Avenues, to cost $5,000.

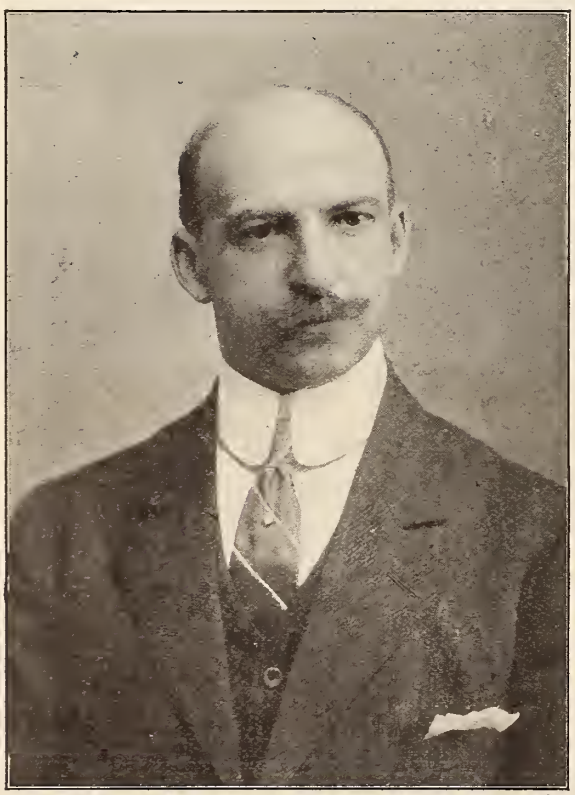
Minneapolis, Minn.—H. L. Ware, 1530-32 Lake Street, will alter building into moving picture show, to cost $1 800.

THE CHAMPION FILM CO.

And Their Manufacturing Plant

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

AS I stood outside the Fort Lee Ferry depot, waiting for the machine containing my escort to arrive, my attention was, for the moment, diverted by the appearance on the scene of a group of real live bronchos. The Mexican cowboy in charge of them swung himself agilely out of the saddle and strode across to the fruit stand, leaving the animals in charge of the always evident small boy. During the time my attention had been claimed by the unusual sight, the automobile containing Mr. Mark M. Dintenfass, general manager of the Champion Film Co., and his party had driven up; and as my eye roamed lazily over the scene I became suddenly aware of its presence, and of a hand beckoning me toward it. We boarded the ferry and in a few moments were safely landed on the far side of the river.



MARK M. DINTENFASS, GEN'L MANAGER

It was an enjoyable ride to which I was treated on my way to the plant of the Champion Film Co., at Coytesville, N. J., winding in and out among the hills along the banks of the beautiful Hudson. Had I been asleep and suddenly awakened I should have believed myself transported to the wilds of the Western plains, so typically Western was the scene that awaited me as we at last turned in at the roadway to the plant. Red Indian braves, gorgeous with paint and feathers slouched about the doors or stood intermingled with the squaws in the neighborhood of the wigwams back of which rose wooded hills skirted with a wealth of underbrush. Genuine Western cowpunchers pistol in belt, lassoo in hand or swung around shoulders, among whom I recognized our friend of the ferry with his herd of bronchos, lounged about among the horses, awaiting the call of the director for the rehearsal of another scene of the Western play, the preparation for which was the true explanation of this panorama of Western grandeur.

The camera man stood ready to turn the crank and do the trick the moment that things were pronounced to be in shape for the taking of the picture. Old Sol persistently withheld his illuminating presence from the scene, and even a few drops of rain fell in aggravating opposition to the wishes of those engaged in the work, and to my extreme disappointment.

However, I made good my opportunity to overlook the plant of the 'Champion" and its splendid equipment. As regards the exterior of the "Champion" plant, it is unpretentious, having been built in a time of turmoil and trouble

ULYSSES DAVIS, DIRECTOR

FRANK B. COIGNE

—a time when the owner was all but in the clutches of the big, greedy, grafting monster, whose multifold talons have sunk deep into the very vitals of our country, seeking to crush out the enthusiasm and energy of the individual, and to destroy the liberty of our people.

Within the plant are the evidences of the expenditure of many thousands of dollars in the way of equipment in properties, costumes, machinery and all the necessities of the modern moving picture plant. After visiting the property room, the dressing rooms, which, by the way, are light, airy, roomy and clean, I was thrust into the weird recesses of the printing and developing room. Passing through a door that sprung quickly to behind us, leaving us in the total darkness of a little ante-room of about 2 x 4 we pushed onward through another door, whose earthly task seemed to be like unto that of the other door—the task of protecting from the slightest ray of light the hundreds of feet of film that reposed in the developing fluid of the numerous tanks with which the room was provided. Not a thing was visible to my unpracticed eye save the half-dozen weird red lights turning to ghostly shadows the figures of the men who worked beneath their sombre rays.

Mr. Dintenfass pointed out and carefully explained the different inanimate occupants of the room in the way of printing machines, tanks, etc. An exhibition was very kindly given me by the men in charge of one of the printing machines whose capacity per hour is about 2,500 feet of film, of the printing of the positive from the negative—the mode of the reproduction of films.

The work of the man in the developing room is very trying—much more trying than the casual observer might suppose.

From the developing room we passed on through the room where the washing of the film is done, and into which it is passed through a carefully guarded aperture in the side of the developing room. A double slide door is arranged on either side of the partition, which is also double, leaving several inches leeway between the two doors, the inner door being opened and closed and the film deposited betwixt doors before the outer one is opened. In this way the film can be passed out and at the same the light be excluded from the dark room. From here we peeped into the assembling room, where the clipping and cementing of the scenes is done, and which was occupied at the time by the secretary and cashier of the plant, a young girl at work on some film, and a huge, soft-eyed Maltese cat, which gazed at us in unconcerned complacency as we walked through. Wandering down the corridor leading to the outside, we turned aside for a moment to the lair of Mr. L. Farini, the good-natured laboratory man, whose happy countenance beamed at us from the half light in which he worked.

Meantime the busy whirl of rehearsing and taking of pictures had re-commenced without. However, it was nearing my time of return to the big city, and I had but time for a few moments' conversation with Mr. Ulysses Davis, director, and his assistant, Mr. Frank B. Coigne, of thirty-three years' stage experience, having traveled with Creston Clarke in Shakespearean roles, and also doing several years' work with the American Theater Co. Mr. Coigne has also acted in the capacity of instructor at Ludman's School of Dramatic Art in Philadelphia. These two men are most enthusiastic in their work, and it is a pleasure indeed to witness the energy and spirit with which work at the "Champion" plant is characterized.

The aged father and mother of Mr. Davis have come to Coytesville to live, in order to be near their son. Said Mr. Davis, "The presence of my mother and father here add an interest and incentive to my work," and his honest brown eyes glistened with the sincerity that backed up his words. The presence of the aged couple added a quaint touch to the surroundings of the "Champion" plant. "It's some forty-eight years since she and I was hitched together," said the old man proudly, as he pointed with an outward curve of his thumb at Mrs. Davis, as she sat beside him in the scene room. It was a beautiful touch of devotion from a past that knew not the present need of a divorce court. Father, mother and son make a quaint trio in this age of instability. The patient, artistic direction of Mr. Davis, Jr., is pleasant to see. "Don't you sometimes grow very tired of this work?" I asked him. "Oh, no, indeed—I never grow tired of it. Sometimes I say to my mother, when I get up in the morning, "Mother, I know I'm going to be awfully tired tonight," and then I go out and work harder perhaps than I have ever done before—I get so interested in my work."

In addition to the open air studio, the only one about the country, so far as I know, and which has a north light, enabling them to use it at any time of the day, there will be commenced within ten days the erection of an additional studio 40 x 48, which will be built entirely of steel and glass, with cement flooring, at a cost of $15,000. The new studio will be 40 feet in height, with the roof slope of 45 degrees. This studio will be principally for winter use, and will have immense doors through which a team and wagon can be driven if necessary.

The capacity of the "Champion" plant is about 200,000 feet of film weekly. The weekly salaries of actors, actresses, etc., employed at the plant amount to a total of about $3,500. Mr. Dintenfass has, at his own expense, put in a water system with a 2½-inch main, which supplies the plant—wash tanks, lavatories, etc.

The Champion Film Co. have been working recently on themes from American history. They propose to give out a number of films on dramatic subjects, in the words of Mr. Dintenfass, "heavier reels of three or four thousand feet."

On September 13th will be released "The Red Devils," from Sydney Drew's great play, made famous throughout the country. This is considered by Mr. Dintenfass to be their masterpiece production up to date. The new studio of the "Champion" is expected to be completed four weeks after its commencement, and on my next trip there, which will be after its completion, I hope to be able to show our readers some photographs of this up-to-date plant which will bring them in closer touch with realities which I have so lamely attempted to describe.

The future success of the Champion Film Co. can be guessed at from the words of Mr. Dintenfass. "I don't care anything about the money part of the thing; I only want to make pictures. I don't care what it costs me; I want the detail and everything in connection with them to be perfect."

Wheeling, W. Va—Mike Avis, of the Victoria Moving Picture Theater, will enlarge the seating capacity of his house.

Columbus, Ohio.—Architect J. S. Goldsmith is preparing plans for remodeling the Krause Butler and Benham Building, on North High Street, for a moving picture show. John Pekras, owner.

The Champion Film Co.

Gentlemen:—The laudable efforts of peace congresses and the provisions of arbitration treaties to the contrary notwithstanding, the masses of humanity still dearly love a fight, and from the days of the shepherd stripling, slung-stone in hand on the plains of Palestine in the early ages, right away down to the burly colored "heavy champ" within the ropes at Reno, the world has vociferously acclaimed its champions. A like reception invariably awaits the exhibitors of Champion films with their realistic and blood stirring battle scenes and border romances.

This tribute I am tendering gratis as a token of my growing admiration for the excellent drawing qualities of your reels.

Yours for crowds,
W. H. CUZNER, Crown Theater.

Aiken, S. C.—The Aiken Theater Co., capital $15,000, T. C. Stone, P. F. Henderson and C. D. Hall.

Childress, Texas.—Ed. Hartzell and associates of this city will erect a new $15,000 theater.

Big Stone Gap, Tenn.—James Taylor will erect an opera house to cost $12,000.

Richmond, W. Va.—M. L. Hofheimer will erect a new picture theater.

Colorado Was Called That

BECAUSE OF THE WONDERFUL COLOR OF ITS CLIFFS AND CANYONS—IT IS

Nature's Masterpiece

masterful, matchless, mystic picture that no human artists can paint. When nature had finished the rest of the world, she threw all the colors left on her palette on what is now known as COLORADO.

The famous Garden of the Gods, Cheyenne Canyon, The Rainbow, Italian Sunset, and a blending of all the sacred beauty and awe-compelling colors are wonderfully portrayed in this picture.

A moving picture camera has accomplished what no artist ever did or could. The Rex has translated the soul-stirring, worship-wooing beauty of the Colorado mountains into a moving picture!

FILMORE'S INSIDE FILM TALK

New Light on the "Silent Stars"

A PICTURE fan remarked to me with regret on the changes that are constantly occurring in the ranks of the picture actresses—how they seem to flit from one company to another and then drop from sight altogether. He said—with justice—that it annoyed him to see a clever woman growing popular at the head of a company and then, without warning, see her vanish like a flash, while some unknown steps into the gap and after the latter's been there long enough to become familiar and likeable, disappears to make room for a new unknown, who endures until the appearance of the newest unknown. This queer process so upsets Mr. Fan that he now declines totally to root for particularly clever actresses—so fast do they come for him!—and I think he is slowly and surely losing his interest in the pictures. Of course, he lays the blame for the silly "quick changing" at the door of the film producer, who after all is the only man who can right a wrong that exists right in the producing plants. So the poor—or rather the rich—producer is "rapped" right and left as a blind money-gorger who is after the gelt first, last and all the time, too busy filling his coffers to recognize merit in his players, and too heartless anyway to appreciate it.

O, for a Week with a Harassed Producer!

IF the holders of this view, and they are legion, could spend just one week in the office of a large, well-harassed film producer, they'd understand quickly why the doctor has ordered him "off" all tea and coffee. And they'd wonder that even medical care could save him from becoming a nervous wreck. For the Czarina of the Studio, as the successful leading lady is known on the "inside," is a terribly artistic proposition for a plain business man to handle.

Where Woman Rules

YOU see, the majority of the picture producers were not bred to theatricals and "artistic propositions" as were their brothers, the big theatrical managers. They've been called from all lines of straight business endeavor, from banking to tailoring. They've always had to go lightly and diplomatically with the women they met in a business way, but never did they have to fear that a woman's whim—and that woman a mere employee—might tie up their whole enterprise. They knew of the "stage temperament" only in a vague sort of way, but they got intimately acquainted with it so quickly as picture producers it made their heads swim—and their hair turn gray.

Filmore Will Recite

THEREFORE let me recite some little "inside" stories that may make you see the turn-your-hair-gray actress as the producer sees her.

"She Loves Me, She Loves Me Not!"

THERE is the case of the actress that was secured from an opposition firm by an astute director, proceeded to "run the shop," defied and interfered with everyone from the watchman up to the president of the company and finally had the "astute director" who hired her discharged. This settled the question of her authority there, and for months she ran up and down the studio floor feazing all who came her way and making life miserable for everyone that was not a "favorite" of hers. Just think on this! You had to be a "favorite" of this temperamental woman if you expected to get your work done and hold your job!

Where Good Looks Hurt

THEN there was the other who made observant picture fans say, "What homely women ——— use in their films," simply because the leading woman had so pronounced a case of stage jealousy she wouldn't stand to see other pretty women in the picture with her! It took away from her own good looks, she figured, and because she was under iron-clad contract the management had to cater to this suicidal whim—suicidal to the management, I mean. It is well known that it is often difficult for a woman to obtain work in the theatrical business if she hasn't comely features, but here is an instance where applicants for engagement were rejected because they WERE pretty!

The Producer as a Mere Convenience

ANOTHER popular "silent actress" made a regular practice of having apparel for her everyday use bought by the costume department. She was highly outraged when an officer of the concern remonstrated with her, and made her "cut it out." Then it was brought to light that she invited friends "out on the picture" with her, just as you'd invite friends to an afternoon tea, and that she forced the bewildered director to tack their restaurant checks onto his expense account, and provide seats for them in the automobiles. Only when the lady brought along an unusually heavy load of friends, and an extra taxi had to be engaged—at the firm's expense—to cart 'em, did the matter came up for official attention. This "picture favorite" only came to the end of her rope when the general manager, waiting for hours in vain for his personal auto that was to take him to a business engagement in town, was told by his chauffeur next morning that he'd carried the leading lady down to one of the theaters because she said it was his employer's order. The chauffeur got the hook quick—but so did the leading lady.

She'd Be "Lead" and Playwright Both

ANOTHER brought a parting of the ways because she wouldn't "go on" in plays she hadn't written. As most of her scenarios were simply "impossible," and she besides expected a lot of real money for them, the trade journals said, "We regret to learn Miss ——— is no longer playing in ——— films."

"Cutting Down" Cut Her Down

STILL another, through her own high popularity in the film of her employers and the influential position her husband held with them, among other impudent demands made one to the end that she be permitted to "cut down" the pictures in which she appeared. To explain: the "cutting down" process is one employed at the studios on first prints on pictures, to bring them within the thousand feet that constitute a full reel. Almost always the director will turn in hundreds of feet above the thousand that can be used. The right to "cut down" the important first print is one that is often vested in a head official of the company and never in any less important personage than a head director. The lady in the case thought the company official who did the "cutting" here didn't treat the scenes containing her as gently as she might, and for the sake of peace a compromise was reached—the official and the lady would do the "cutting" together. But the lady didn't live up to her side of the bargain for while she actually didn't object to the official's presence in the "cutting room" she expected him to heed all of her "cuts" and forgot there were any of his own and she got her notice—upon which she made her husband leave with her!

She Merely Whispers Nowadays

ANOTHER married "lead" with a husband on the premises used to hold confidential conversation on forbidden topics with him in tones that could be heard all over the studio. When a mere director meekly asked her to leave her private affairs at home, or really discuss them privately, she retorted that she'd sue him for libelling her! But she met her Waterloo in a woman, the wife of the owner, and a good Methodist, who dropped in to look the studio over and—heard. She did what any good Methodist wife would do, and hubby did the rest.

Why Producers Don't Always Believe Their Actresses

IT is totally untrue that the film producers fail to appreciate ability, as is proved by the length of time most of them will bear in silence the annoyances inflicted on them by their "stars." It is true, however, that many producers are not as prone to believe in her veracity as they are in that of females in other fields. A charitable view of some is that she is a thoroughly veracious, dependable human who has been "contaminated" by an atmosphere that won't allow veracity or dependableness within its limits. Take the case of:

The Girl Who Could Learn

A CLEVER miss of good family who had spent some time with a legitimate traveling show came in from the road, hied herself to the office of a picture producer and applied for a position at leading business that then happened to be vacant. The producer is one that cares not whether his players have done picture work before, but in the course of the conversation he casually asked, "This your first try at pictures?"

"Yes," said the fair young thing, raising her innocent baby eyes appealingly, "but—but I'm sure I—I—I c-c-can learn."

"Tut, tut!" said the producer reassuringly, "that doesn't matter a bit—if you've got the goods my director will bring it out of you, whether you're experienced or not." Then he summoned the director to give her a try-out.

He Even Doubts Youth and Innocence

AS she tripped out of his office and across the studio floor, the producer noticed the girl bump into a property man, whose hand was outstretched in welcome and whose face bore a pleasant smile. But Miss Would-Learn affected not to know him, and unceremoniously brushed by him. The incident interested the observant producer. Calling the "props" to him, he asked him what the matter was. "Blessed if I know," said props, "she appeared not to know me and yet when I worked at Jowers she jobbed there in several pictures and came to know me enough to call me by my first name!" The producer thought of the pure blue eyes that turned appealingly to heaven as their owner said in halting baby tones, "I c-c-can learn!" Small wonder he feels the word of none of his actresses is to be depended on, even that of the young and innocent!

Don't Sacrifice Your "Prestige" for the Truth

AND the refined little lady?

She felt it meant a loss of prestige to admit she had done "jobbing," and her artistic temperament could not and would not brook that.

Youth and Innocence Appealed to Him, Too

THE foregoing reminds me of that other young miss whose pleasing, modest ways at the interview inclined the producer toward giving her the job that would soon be open—because of his present leading woman's ungovernable temper. Young girls as picture "leads" were coming into vogue just then, and this man thought it worth while to chance one in the place long filled by the mature woman who was as expert at creating dissension in a theatrical establishment as she was at camera posing. The particular young girl was more than passing fair, seemed bright, and he was sure that plenty of careful rehearsing would bring results. Anyway, she was so mild and unassuming that the producer was willing to risk a little less perfection in his pictures for a little more harmony in his studio. The young one was to come back next day for some rehearsing. She showed up with eyes all red and wrinkled from weeping. "Lordy, child!" said the producer, "what can be the matter?" "Oh, nothing," was the simple reply, "I lost my library book and it upset me a little." All that day she went about her rehearsals in a fret that frightened the director and gave the producer evil forebodings. That evening the producer mentioned to a friend who lived in the young thing's house that he was giving her a trial.

"Whatever you do," counselled the friend, "impress on her that she can't have her own way—make that clear to her immediately if you would avoid more trouble than you know even now."

The Temperament and the "Kid"

WHAT, she—SHE?" protested the producer, "SHE doesn't look like a trouble maker. Why, she's a mere KID!"

"Maybe," said the friend, "maybe. But a kid in the show business is different from a kid in anything else. She's been a 'professional' for over a year now and it's developed her into a regular Virago!"

Then he went on to relate that living as he did in the apartment adjoining the young thing's, he had heard her browbeat her parents in great shape that morning because they had actually objected to her wearing slippers outside while the streets were still dripping from an early morning downpour. She went out of the house that morning in tears—and in slippers. And the producer recalled the glib statement about the library book!

Where Obstinacy Reaches Its Highest Development

CHARGE this to the show business. It's the only place you can. Of course, an obstinate person is a source of trouble anywhere, but an obstinate FEMALE in a theatrical atmosphere can nurse the spirit into a menace that e'en the phrase "bull-in-a-china-shop" can't describe. And the little girl before she entered into the stage work and the stage associations that developed her thin streak of obstinacy into a full-blown "artistic trait," had been a sure-enough mamma's girl who only bought an ice cream soda when mamma said she could!

After Miss Young Thing—a Manikin!

AND the truth of his friend's opinions were proved to the producer in mighty short order. In one short week, the young thing automatically discharged herself. She insisted on the director having a copy of each of his scripts made for her, and he came hot-foot into the producer's office with the declaration that Miss Young Thing must leave—or he would. Mr. Producer concluded that Miss Young Thing had had chance enough, and, as the director was too good a man to lose, Miss Young Thing went—quick. They're thinking of putting in a manikin to play "female leads" at that studio now!

The Harmless Male Player

NOW don't say "Funny that Filmore only pans the ladies; a man never WILL knock a man!" because you may make a mistake—Filmore MAY be a female, at that. No one knows; certainly YOU don't! The fact of the matter is that the male picture players are "no bother at all, thank you" to the producers. When they change from one producer's employ to another's, which isn't as often as their sisters do, it is for business and not "artistic" reasons. At no time in the history of the business have the producers been forced to regard the male player, big or little, as a problem of the day; and as I am presenting problems alone this week I cannot include the picture actor.

High and Low, They Know Her for Her Temperament

OF course, it is no more true that ONLY the leading women have the temperamental drawbacks described at the start of my story than it is true that ALL leading women have them. The ordinary "jobber" (or five-dollar-a-day extra woman) displays disquieting eccentricities, too, let it be said. Also, it isn't the studio heads alone who catalogue picture women with Wellman, Congress, the Giants, aeroplanes and the other undependables. No, even the minor studio workers know her for her temperament. Take Jaggers, whose experience was an average one, but whose human interest way of telling it was so extra interesting that I felt if I could set it down on paper just as he told it to me; it couldn't help but make my department interesting reading this week.

The Story of Jaggers

JAGGERS is the costume chief of one of the largest studios. By costume chief, I mean that Jaggers, which, of course, isn't his name at all, looks after the costumes for the producer that employs him. Now, while Jaggers' job is a lowly one, it is also an influential one. That is, he is not one of the bosses of the shop, but his work makes him "stand in" with the bosses—in this case the directors—and so he is fairly a person of influence at his plant. As costume man, and a good one, he can do much to help the directors in a pinch, and they cultivate his good will as he cultivates theirs. Being in their confidence, he will very often make suggestions that they listen to and even carry out.

Women a "Bunch o' Kickers" to Jaggers

JAGGERS is an old theatrical man, a bachelor, with little or no eye to the charms of the fair sex, likely because his costume job has meant one constant squabble with pretty ladies who were always dissatisfied with the outfits he forked over to them. I am not revealing Jaggers' identity when I mention this. I'd hate to give a dollar for every costume man who bore a business grudge against womankind because they seemed to bear a grudge against him—always a "kick" and never a bouquet. Small wonder Mr. Costume Man sees woman precisely the way the department store floorwalker does—a mere bunch of irresponsible "kickers." Not that Jaggers is a woman hater. Far from it. After business hours, he goes to a home where women relatives make it very pleasant for him and are a real comfort and solace. Here they are not "kickers" and he thinks them saints—his professional viewpoint is all in the day's work. Even in his working hours he meets women who DO seem considerate, and, of course, his "bunch o' kickers" sentiment doesn't apply to THEM.

He Meets One Who Isn't a "Kicker"

ONE such considerate female impressed him mightily—no, this won't be a love yarn, for Jaggers is too blasé to figure in that—and he watched her work in the picture they were putting on that day. Oh, to explain about that impression—the girl was of a sensible, business-like, courteous type that Jaggers rarely met at the costume window, and they struck up a friendship which later, since they lived in the same neighborhood, meant visits to each other's homes and to theaters and places of amusement. In these trips the girl poured out her soul to Jaggers—while she liked the legitimate stage, her ambition was to become a moving picture leading lady. Jaggers instantly swore to help her attain her ambition by every device he could employ, and the little lady seemed happy. But to grab a leading lady job was some stunt for the girl—up to now she was a mere "jobber," that is, playing such "bits" as she could pick up at the different studios at $5 a day. Generally, she managed to get in one lone day a week. But while no job in the legitimate offered, she was forced to continue making the dreary rounds of the studios. She had realized that she'd never get a chance at the leading lady job and thought only of "copping out" the five-spot.

The One Who Never "Kicked" Is Clever

THE sad part was that she was really clever. Jaggers knew it. From the first time he saw her "filling in" in a scene at his studio, his experienced eye told him she was meant for better things. Of course, the directors had experienced eyes, too; but their eyes were mainly for the people playing the principal roles. This was only natural—the success of the picture depends on the "leads" up front and not the "fillers-in" in the background; and Mr. Director had all he could do watching the "leads" go through their paces. But Jaggers, from the wings, could concentrate on the minor people—on her. It didn't take much sizing-up on his part to bring him to a realization that the girl lacked not the ability but the chance.

Jaggers Helps the Unusual Lady

HE determined to give it to her, or rather get it for her, and went to see the director. Here is where the "influence" I mentioned above came in. The director kindly cast the girl for a real part in the morrow's picture.

The Girl Is All Gratitude

THE girl was all gratitude to Jaggers when she learned the good news. Never, never would she forget such kindness. She even sent Jaggers' women relatives a basket of their favorite fruit, paid for out of the much-needed five dollars for the "fill-in" work, and with it a note reading something like this:

> "I trust remembrance of your own and your brother's kindness to me shall be with me long, long after this fruit shall have perished."

Which was crude and horrible, but the girl was flustered as she handed the grocer the five spot, and anyway it shows the spirit that was there. Besides, you can't do EVERYTHING well. This feminine couldn't compose a message, but she COULD act in pictures.

This Isn't a Fairy Tale—Why

NEXT day at the studio she acted so well in the real part that even the director remarked on it. And directors aren't given much to remarking. I wish I could say here that the director immediately made her his leading lady, as per her great ambition, but this isn't a fairy story and I've got to give you the facts as Jaggers gave them to me.

The Girl Bids Tearful Good-bye

NO, new leading ladies are created only when the old ones leave or get fired; and this director's leading lady was doing neither. The girl stayed around playing parts for three weeks, averaging now five days per week, and then a theatrical agent offered her a steady engagement in an out-of-town stock company and after bidding a tearful good-bye to kindly Jaggers and his folks she ran over and took it.

The Jaggers Family to the Rescue!

HERE'S where the unexpected happened. The leading lady both left and got fired. She had counted on getting away one afternoon to "take in" a certain matinee, but the director was forced to renig on his promise to let her off as it had rained all that morning and he hadn't been able to take a foot of film. So he was forced to ask Mme. Leading Lady to forget the matinee and work with him instead, for it was high noon, the sun was coming out in a way that promised much, and the management wouldn't stand to see a whole day lost. Whereupon Mme. Leading Lady went into a French huff, waved her theater tickets in the director's face and announced that she had quit—just as the director announced that she'd been fired. Jaggers told all about the fracas at the dinner table that night. In a flash, one of the relatives recommended that Jaggers mention the girl acquaintance for the job. True, she had a steady job and at good money, but hadn't she also that picture-leading-lady ambition? They hadn't forgotten this, though some little time had elapsed since the girl had been around to say good-bye. Anyway, if the director was willing, they'd wire her first thing in the morning.

Jaggers Sends the Wire that "Means All" to the Girl

WELL, the director gave thoughtful Jaggers his ear, agreed that the girl was clever at picture work and "pretty good material," and while he had other people in mind for the position who were right at hand, agreed to wait until Jaggers heard from the telegram, which ran: "Miss Jones leaves two weeks. Do you want position? Sixty dollars."

And the Director Smiled

BUT had he waited, he'd be waiting yet. For the girl never answered thoughtful Jaggers' wire. To make certain it got to her, Jaggers had the message repeated. Also he rushed off a registered letter by special delivery mail. Back came the registry receipt, but still no answer to the message. And yet no answer to the message. And, continuing, no answer to the message. AND THERE NEVER GOT TO BE AN ANSWER TO THAT MESSAGE. Of course, for the sake of his self-respect, Jaggers claimed there was one—when the director inquired. He said the girl had replied that she was under ironclad contract to her present managers and couldn't leave their employment. Jaggers gulped as he said this, and the knowing director pretended not to understand and asked to see the girl's wire. Jaggers, with a little catch in his voice, said he had mislaid it and the comprehending director, who himself had tried to do women in the business favors similar to this, flashed at him an all-wise smile.

The Reply that Never Came

AND neither Jaggers nor a single member of his "so kind" household ever got a line from the girl they had tried to help, not even the post-card she promised to send them "the minute I get off the train" at the city to which the agency had sent her.

So Jaggers Fell in with the General Spirit!

JAGGERS has only business words, gruff ones, for the "actorines" these days. And if he lives to the age of one hundred he'll never do, say or wish a kind thing for a "moving picture actress!"

"The Temperament—THAT Temperament"

IN this feeling, of course, I don't sympathize with Jaggers. I say that for Jaggers' years in the show business he might have expected, though not directly looked for, what he got. With his experience he should have discerned the first time he met her that the girl had "the temperament." There you have the root of all the evil—"the temperament"—THAT "temperament." The temperament that will allow you to permit another to do you a courtesy and excuse you when you haven't the courtesy to acknowledge it! The temperament that, as in this instance, will pass off easily an inattention on the part of a stage woman that would be counted a horrible breach of etiquette on the part of a woman in any other line of endeavor! The woman WITH "the temperament" merely charges such an infraction TO "the temperament," and lets it go at that. The girl in this case saw no crime in what she did. She had simply cultivated the Jaggerses' friendship while she was in their city, and now that she was in another city she had new and other interests that quite took up all her time. And as for the picture-leading-lady ambition, well, she'd forgotten that along with the Jaggers family and was slowly but surely developing into a first-rate stock character actress. She hadn t answered the wire either "yes" or "no" because there were two holidays that week and her company gave matinees on both of 'em, and she was so fatigued that she hadn't the energy to send off a simple wire reading "Very sorry. Impossible for me to accept. Your kindness appreciated!" And as to the post-card she failed to send "the minute I get off the train"—the post-card stand wasn't open for business when she alighted, and later on, when she had made new friends, she figured that since she was a roving person and the Jaggers quite stationary they couldn't have much in common and—oh, THAT "temperament!"

Just a Line More on "THAT Temperament"

YES, Oh, THAT "temperament!" Even as I write there comes to me the news that one of the nearby producers may have to throw out an entire reel because the photography in some of the scenes is pretty punk, and the lady who chiefly figured in the scenes to be re-taken is now out of their employ and in California. California! Rats! She's down at one of the nearby beaches having the time of her life. But she is "in California" so far as the re-take that will save the certain producer dollars on dollars is concerned. Why, you ask? Well, the producer wouldn't let her select her successor when she left, but instead had the nerve to appoint a woman with whom our friend had a quarrel of four years' standing and who had "never ought been let inside the studio, the mean old cat!"

How to Get Rich Quick

AND so "the temperament" is losing money for the producers all the time. The man who can invent a means to eradicate it will draw a bigger cash prize from the producers than the man who can invent the steadiest camera ever known! FILMORE.

THROUGH THE AIR

A Notable Aviation Picture Recently Filmed by the Imp Company

One of the recent innovations in the realm of moving pictures has been "put over" in a successful way by the Imp Company in a film entitled "Through the Air," in which a genuine airship is introduced in a novel and sensational manner. As there is more or less interest taken in all things pertaining to air navigation the story will prove a winner. It has many features of appeal, chief among them a thrilling race in which the airship and a fast automobile are pitted against each other, and the air navigator wins, to the satisfaction of the audience. There is a pretty little love story interwoven, a strong plot, and an exciting finale, which carries the interest unabated from curtain to curtain. A party of gold seekers go prospecting, the daughter of the old man in charge of the party accompanying them. A young man, one of the prospectors, falls in love with the girl, and his attentions are not welcomed. The old man makes a rich find, and his partners conceive the idea of putting him out of the way and enjoying the rich find. The father is attacked and left for dead, and the papers he has prepared to file on the claim are stolen by the young man who would marry the daughter. The girl sets about it to checkmate the villains. She goes to the young aviator and solicits his aid. Duplicate deeds to the claim are hastily made, and the bird man starts in his air ship on the perilous flight to beat the villain to the office of the recorder. He wins the race and also the hand of the girl, as well as the gratitude of the wounded father. The sensational race in which the motor and the airship are shown in competition is thrilling in the extreme.

Hastings, Pa.—Plans are being prepared for a new opera house to be erected on Main street by John Siebert and J. A. Commons.

Hamilton, Ohio—Sims and Benzing will make improvements to the Jewel Theater to cost $7,000.

Baltimore, Md—The Madison Amusement Co. will erect a new moving picture theater at Madison avenue and Bloom street to cost $4,000.

Storm Lake, Ia—D. E. Fyock will establish a moving picture theater here.

By G. F. Blaisdell

FROM all over the country comes news of new moving picture houses. So many are opening these late summer days that it would seem to be in order for persons inclined to look pessimistically on the general situation to revise their views. In North Adams, Mass., it is said that the Rev. Father Lattanzi, of St. Anthony of Padua Church, will, if he can procure the necessary license, convert the Columbus Opera House into a picture theater. In Springwood, Conn., parties are awaiting a license to open a show in the former Hungarian Reformed Church edifice. In Butte, Mont., the new Orpheum, seating 700, opened on August 9. Alterations to the building in which it is situated involved an expense of $20,000. The Orpheum has a twenty-four-foot stage and orchestra space for ten musicians.

In Memphis plans are being prepared for a $10,000 theater to be erected at 49 South Main Street by the Majestic Amusement Company. William E. Brown will build a picture theater at 2316 Vine Street, Cincinnati. Waggoner & Rickett have leased and will reopen the Majestic Theater at Redlands, Cal., which has been closed for several months. Vernon J. Price & Co. are to extensively remodel, extend and decorate the Sunbeam Theater, of Duluth, Minn. J. S. Kaylor has opened the new Gem Theater in Hannibal, Mo. The new Orpheum Theater, of Calumet, Mich., seating 700, opened on August 14th, under the management of D. E. Rice. Walter E. Barber, of Johnstown, N. Y., will open the new Lyric on September 4th. In Philadelphia the Allegheny Amusement Company will erect a theater at 3139-49 Frankford Avenue. George S. Jarvis has leased Masonic Hall, Chester, Pa., for a picture house, and will make necessary alterations.

The Victoria Theater, Milwaukee's newest picture house, opened on August 12th. Morris Spiers, of Philadelphia, on August 22d, threw open the doors of a $15,000 house on Girard Avenue. The Interstate Amusement Company, a Pacific Coast concern, will build one, and possibly two theaters in Spokane. The Kosciusko Theater Company, of Milwaukee, will spend $10,000 on the construction of a theater on the north side of Lincoln Avenue. In Shelbyville, Ind., Frank J. Rembusch has awarded contracts for a $20,000 house. Dr. Galeski, owner of several Richmond (Va.) theaters, is to build a house in Roanoke. Ned Kornblite, of Binghamton, N. Y., will spend $3,000 on an extension to his Star Theater. In Flatbush, a suburb of Brooklyn, the Linden, a $50,000 structure, was opened on August 28th.

Throughout New York State the municipal authorities are still wondering how they are going to comply with the new law regarding the licensing of operators. This law was to become operative in June, but as no license can be issued unless the applicant has served a six months' apprenticeship under a licensed operator—and outside of New York City there are no licensed operators—the authorities are more than puzzled. Perhaps Governor Dix may by this time see that he did not play the part of a statesman when he vetoed a bill eliminating the apprenticeship clause. It is another form of the old query: Whence came the first egg?

Vitagraph has ten directors. They must have got together on "For Love and Glory." Americans abroad may look upon this picture and feel just pride in their home product. They need have no fear that any foreign company can better it; it is a question if the stock company of any of the foreign manufacturers can equal it. The story is of a British army lieutenant, Osmond, who, a year or two after marrying against his father's wishes, is ordered to South Africa. The scene in which he awakens his wife and infant to say goodbye gives to Miss Helen Gardner an opportunity to display her ability as an actress. Her work throughout is the work of an artist. Alec Francis, to whom fell the duty of informing Mrs. Ormond of the death of her husband, dominated one of the strongest scenes in a strong play. His return of the sword of the dead lieutenant carried its own story. He displayed full realization of the pathos of the tragedy in which he was taking part. Many actors might with much profit study his work in this short scene. They would learn that there are far greater impressiveness and dramatic force in dignified naturalness than in hysterical gymnastics. The work of Maurice Costello, as the lieutenant, and of Van Dyke Brooke, as the father of Mrs. Osmond, was good, as their work always is. Will D. Corbett well carried out the unpopular role of the irate father of the bride.

Speaking about the Vitagraph, right here the writer desires to register his humble opinion: That there is not in the employ of any other manufacturer, at home or abroad, so well balanced a company of players. Some of the American companies are strong on young—it might be said very young—men. Which is very well in its way. But age gives experience; and it is only through experience and years of patient study that men and women attain the higher levels of dramatic art. By no means does the writer decry the work of the young men in the motion picture drama. He is trying to point out that the best company is the one composed of actors of all ages, and so balanced that it is not necessary to attempt to disguise a face devoid of the wear of age to represent that of a man of fifty or sixty or seventy. The director who puts a youth into the role of a man of middle age knows, or should know, that the screen reveals and uncovers a disguise or a makeup that behind the footlights would pass undetected. A makeup discerned is an illusion broken. Vitagraph carries few men under thirty; there are many of the company near that age; but think of Vitagraph without John Bunny, William Shea, Van Dyke Brooke, E. R. Phillips and Charles Kent!

Superintendent of Schools Albert Armstrong, of Vallejo, Cal., in addressing the City Council recently, urged the appointment of a censor for all picture theaters.

Councilmen Alex Bernstein, of Cleveland, is "contemplating" offering a resolution in council calling for a local board of censors.

Petitions are being circulated in Lewiston, Idaho, asking the council to permit the three picture shows of the town to open on Sundays. Few of the voters are withholding their signatures, many church members, even, going on record as favoring Sunday opening, provided the performances are so scheduled as not to interfere with Sunday evening church services.

George Law, a Lancaster (Ohio) proprietor, was arrested on August 13th for keeping his place open on Sunday. All the picture houses were closed several months ago on affidavits filed by the Ministerial Association, and Law was the first to attempt a reopening.

The historical pageant of "The Landing of Columbus," which will be reproduced by the motion picture camera. In the ceremony the three caravels, the replicas of Columbus' Pinta, Nina, and Santa Maria, which were brought to this country for the Columbian Exposition in 1893, will have a prominent place. The ships, which were a present from the Spanish Government, have a permanent resting place at Jackson Park. The Knights of Columbus, under whose auspices the pageant will be conducted, have given a bond to the Park Commissioners in the sum of $100,000 for the safe return of the fleet.

On Sunday morning last all the newspapers published accounts of "another moving picture horror," telling of the explosion of a film, of resulting flame, and of smoke issuing from the projection booth. The Associated Press sent out a story that the operator closed the door to his cage as the film burst into flame and then went to work to put out the fire; that a few momens later, nearly smothered and his hands badly burned, he opened the door and the smoke that poured through started the panic that resulted in the deaths of twenty-six human beings and the injury of sixty others.

In order that the readers of the News who may live a distance from the scene of the Canonsburg (Penn.) disaster might have accurate knowledge of just what did cause the panic the writer secured copies of Monday's issue of the three Pittsburg morning papers. A careful reading and comparison of the different accounts indicates that what happened is this:

In a hall situated in the second story of a building, the seating capacity of which is reported to be from 1,000 to 1,500, but which is probably nearer 700, the operator was turning out "A Little Child Shall Lead Them." At the point where the housewife was proudly displaying the huge frosted cake she had made for the church fair the reel broke. The light from the lamp flashed white upon the screen and as quickly was blanketed. The operator, John McCullough, repaired the break and calmly went on with the remainder of the reel. The woman at the piano continued to play. Many people—some reports say 100—remained in the front of the house watching the whole reel, so interested in the picture they had not observed or noted the fatal panic below stairs.

Manager Ferguson says that a hundred people waiting in the hallway below the theater, and to that extent blocking the exit, were the ones who furnished many of the victims. He says 714 tickets had been sold for the performance. The projection booth is made of metal and lined with asbestos.

Theaters may be made fireproof, booths may be made fireproof, but no house can be made panic-proof. Here is a theater with five emergency exits, yet until the arrival of the police and firemen they were practically ignored. In Hartford, Conn., two weeks ago an audience, startled by several severe thunderclaps, made a rush for the door. The quick wit of the operator turned a panic into a laugh. He threw on the screen this hastily scribbled note: "Don't hurry out. Only the wicked are afraid of thunder!"

Several film fires have occurred throughout the country during the past month, however. In Sacramento, Cal., fire started in the booth of the Oak Park Theater, resulting in damage estimated at $30,000, which included the loss on adjacent buildings. A number of people were slightly injured in the panic, but none seriously. "Sky" Burman, the operator, had a close call, but escaped with severe burns.

Martin Chimeme, operator at the Ruby Vaudeville, Galveston, Texas, threw a burning film through the window to the street. Patrons stampeded, but no injury resulted. The destroyed film represented the only loss. Here was another operator who may have had his hands burned, but the heat never reached his head.

In Skaneateles, N. Y., on August 16, fire started in the booth of a picture show house and partially destroyed the building. The audience escaped without a panic. Prompt action by the firemen prevented the blaze extending to other property.

Without the pretense of having technical knowledge of the nature of the defect in the film which was what might be described as the innocent cause of the Canonsburg horror, it seems to the writer that a great deal of the delays resulting from broken films might be prevented by more careful supervision in the exchanges. On Tuesday forenoon of this week the writer dropped in at a picture house on Broadway—one which in many respects is perhaps the best in the country—and was amazed at the sort of stuff that was being thrown on the screen. After having seen four reels, in each of which there were at least two breaks, the writer lost patience and went to the manager and inquired if the house usually put on such junk as the stuff on the screen.

The manager smiled, and suavely replied that he had been held up by the exchange and was obliged to put on stock stuff until the arrival of his daily supply. The time was 12.15. It may be true that the old reels did not come from any exchange, and were private property. The fact remains, however, that there was a lack of care somewhere.

This all leads to the question which might be phrased thus: When is a picture not a picture? The answer is simple; When it is junk. The time will come when municipal authorities—it might well be the department of health or of public safety—will take cognizance of rainy, spotted films and in the interest of the community hold to a strict accountability an exhibitor displaying them. They are an abomination. When the public is better acquainted with the technique of picturedom it also will take a hand in the matter and "talk turkey" to the exhibitor who permits an exchange to thrust such stuff upon him. There are many who think that the constant watching of moving pictures will injure the eyes. What is probably the fact is that good, clear films, thrown from a projector in proper condition—carbons burning properly and all bearings properly adjusted, giving a steady register on the screen—are absolutely innocuous. It would, however, be a hardy individual who would attempt to maintain that streaks and spots are not injurious to eyesight.

Honor to whom honor is due! Well may the "alien operator," thrown on the street at the beginning of the year through the perpetration of perhaps the most unusual piece of legislation ever consummated in this country, thank our good friend Saunders for his persistent, bulldog work in aiding the undoing of what was nothing short of outrage! Having had the privilege of looking over his correspondence with Mayor Gaynor, Governor Dix and Secretary of State Knox, the writer is in a position to speak advisedly on the subject. Congratulations to the editor of the News; also to those operators who now are restored to their rights as residents of the country which frowns upon all attempts to deny every man a square deal.

The compliments of the Observer to The Man in the Baths! With one request: Will The Man in the Baths kindly permit the compliments also to extend to The Lady in the Baths? Also a confession: The Observer never overlooks the comment from Hot Springs. Certainly the high temperature out there never has the slightest influence over "their" breezy and entertaining talk. Also another confession: Colorado cannot be in it for a minute with "The Valley of Vapors" when it comes to real, downright enterprise, if we are to have forced upon us the pictures of the health-giving and youth-renewing Hot Springs so alluringly promised by the Western Correspondent. Just a minute. It is not a promise. Distinctly it is a threat. Why, Man, if that bunch of yours out there in Arkansaw should make good on the prospectus you have outlined you'll depopulate the Atlantic seaboard. Then again, once the Easterners had imbibed of the Fountain of Perpetual Youth they might decide to remain and not come back—that is, of course, return.

Enterprise, you know, is all right in its way; there is, however, such a thing as carrying it too far.

The moving picture craze at last has penetrated Gibbon, Neb. The following important announcement appeared in the Kearney (Neb.) Hub on August 12th.

The authorities of Montclair, N. J., have steadily refused to permit a moving picture show in that town. However, someone has given to Grace Presbyterian Church, of which the Rev. George J. Baker is pastor, a complete moving picture outfit. It will be largely employed during the coming fall and winter. This may be said to be an up-to-date way of whipping the devil around the stump!

It was announced recently in Washington that a local manufacturer proposed to bring to that gay city one Beulah Binford what time the criminal authorities of Richmond, Va., saw fit to release a detaining hand upon her, and pose her in moving pictures. Washington clergymen from their pulpits vigorously denounced the proposed action, and later in a body called upon District Commissioner Cuno Rudolph. It is not probable that such pictures, even if any pandering manufacturer should have the indecency to make them, would be permitted in any self-respecting community; and about all communities are self-respecting.

It is gratifying to be able to add that the manufacturer in question is not affiliated either with the licensed or independent factions.

According to the figures of the National Bureau of Statistics, the exports of photographic goods, composed largely of motion picture films, for 1911, were $7,000,000, against $4,750,000 for 1910.

Mrs. Lizzie Haybeck, of Philadelphia, while witnessing in a New York City picture show the portrayal of a Western stage coach hold-up, suffered an attack of heart failure and died in a few minutes.

Uncle Sam himself is going into the moving picture show business, says the Philadelphia Inquirer.

With the authority of President Taft, a contract has been entered into by the government officials and a Chicago firm for the purpose of reproducing in moving pictures all of the various activities of the nation. The picture will be shown in hundreds of moving picture houses.

Marines at work on battleships, gunners firing at the hulk of an old battleship, cavalry drills, mine and rescue work, plant and animal industry, road building, and every single activity of the government will be shown on the films.

The problem of educating the public to the work being done by its own government was carefully considered by the President and members of his cabinet before the contract was entered into. Each cabinet officer was then authorized to make his own arrangement with the film concern, having the right to arrange for such pictures as he wished to have taken and reject those he does not care for.

In the United States office of public roads, for instance, the director, Logan Waller Page, arranged to have pictures taken showing the effects of good and bad roads. In the case of the latter, the films will show the farmer trying to carry loads of produce over a bad road; how he became sick; how the doctor is unable to reach him, and how, because of the mud-ruts, the undertaker finds it exceedingly difficult to get him to his grave. Another film will show another farmer carrying his produce—twice as much—over a model road constructed under the supervision of the government and the general improvement of the surrounding country.

The Department of Agriculture will be able to show, in entertaining as well as instructive style, the effects of pure food and impure food; the Secretary of War will be able to show the advantages of army life, and the Secretary of the Navy the advantages of life on the bounding waves, while the Interior Department will be showing how forest fires are fought and entombed miners are rescued.

The government will be killing two birds with one stone, improving the tone of the moving pictures and eliminating those that have a bad effect, while educating the public to the work done by its government.

The time is not far distant, apparently, when the first nighter at the "movies," instead of jubilating over the way the tramp captured the Indians, will be remarking, learnedly:

"I never knew why the sailors wore their trousers wide at the bottom, but I saw by the films last night that it is to enable them to roll up the ends when they want to swab the deck."

And his girl will remark: "Oh, and they are showing how the government teaches cooking. I learned how to bake stuffed tomatoes at the 'movies' last night."

When the moving picture educational campaign is announced, it will sound interesting and intellectual. It would be far more interesting, however, to have seen the high official who sat at a moving picture show one night and suddenly exclaimed to himself: "By George, the government ought to use this craze for educational purposes."

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., Aug. 31.—So far as events startling are concerned the past week was featureless in this respect. Out here we are on the last lap of the hot summer, although there are still many heated sessions in store for us so far as "Old Sol" is concerned, but the vaudeville houses are making arrangements for the fall campaign, while the picture men are scanning with eager interest the trade papers for any special feature the manufacturers are contemplating to "buck" the heavier theatrical attractions.

Manager Frank Head has sent out very "nifty" and striking invitations, calling attention to the second grand opening of the Princess Theater, which the eclat of the city are receiving in their daily mail and which, as usual, will bring a capacity audience. This popular house, one of the prettiest and most complete in the South, will begin its regular vaudeville season next Monday. Arrangements have been made to book through the Western Vaudeville Association, and the Princess will play a "split week" with the Kempner Theater in Little Rock, while other cities in the South to get the same acts will be Ft. Worth, San Antonio, Galveston, Shrevesport, Birmingham and a host of others of the first class. Many improvements in the way of interior decorations have been added to the Princess and assurance is given that the acts will be the very best in the vaudeville world. Another thing that Manager Head was most particular about and that was his pictures. This time he is going to run the Independent output, as he has tried about everything the trust has to offer. He has received assurance from his film company that they will provide at least one Imp and one Bison reel with every shipment, which, combined with excellent vaudeville, assures his patrons of a show that cannot be excelled for the price of admission charged.

Announcement for some of the shows that will play the Auditorium this season is also made by Manager Head and these include the much-married Nat Goodwin, all the big minstrel companies, Tim Murphy, several grand opera attractions, Billy Clifford, Forbes and Robertson, Polly of the Circus, together with the recent New York successes, so that the coming season here promises to be a most interesting one. Patrons to the Auditorium will be agreeably surprised at the many improvements that have been made at this house, which has been completely redecorated and improved, all of which, it can be stated, was needed.

Hot Springs is not the only resort to resort to moving pictures to gain the necessary advertising, for, Eureka Springs, not so very far from here, has decided to come out of its shell and call on the film manufacturers to provide them with a series of pictures setting forth the excellent medicinal waters of the resort, as well as the beauties of the town, together with its business prospects. These pictures, however, are for a special entertainment, if you please, and no one but "Uncle Sam's" officials in the Interior Department, together with a certain Congressional committee, will view them. Eureka Springs wants to make the government take notice that it is a resort of importance enough to receive some of the advertising that the United States Department of the Interior is sending forth, and the government before it "falls" for the play wants "to be shown." Hence the pictures. The officials are too busy to come to Eureka Springs, and photographs are too stale a medium, but motion pictures—ah, that's different. The government men have signified their great willingness to gaze at motion pictures of Eureka Springs and the edict has gone forth from the town officials to "clean up"; the ladies will look their sweetest; the men will look their neatest, and the camera man will behold a "bunch" that will give him intense delight to film. When the pictures are developed a committee from Eureka Springs will carry the film to Washington, where it will be shown for the special edification of those who have the power to give Eureka Springs a place on the government mailing list. It's a progressive little resort and deserves the assistance of the government, but don't lose sight of the fact that moving pictures were necessary to virtually put it "on the map."

Although I have been in Hot Springs going on two years I never accepted the invitation extended me by Carl Hansen to look over his effects in the orchestra pit of the Lyric until the other day. I was both startled and immensely pleased at this young man's progressiveness and ingenuity. In no other theater in the South, I doubt, is a more complete line installed for this purpose. He has over 125 different effects, so arranged that he can reach them in an instant they are needed. There is no bird or beast shown in moving pictures that makes a sound but what the trap drummer at the Lyric hasn't the correct imitation. There's no storm effect but what he can imitate. In fact, there hasn't been anything that plays its part in the pictures but what he can give the correct sound from the orchestra pit. He has two doors and locks there with numerous kind of bolts. One door is for the effect when the door of an auto is closed. The others for the different kinds of doors and locks. Bells and whistles of all size and description, giving all manner of sounds are also at his command. The entire display he values at over $1,000, and most of them he made himself. I would like to have Montgomery, the well-known picture magnate of Memphis, Tenn., see this lad's display, for I can imagine what he would say. Mr Montgomery is numbered among the country's leading and greatest and most successful picture theater managers, and if there's one thing, I hear, he takes a delight in it is having the requisite effects to a picture. In this respect Carl Hansen, of the Lyric, leads 'em all.

Biograph sent us two good reels this week, "The Last Drop of Water," which was a masterpiece and elicited round after round of applause and a world of favorable comment, and "The Ruling Passion," which thrilled all who saw it. Edison's "Bunker Hill" picture was also much enjoyed, as was the "Doomed Ship," even if a little overdrawn. The character work in that picture was excellent. "The Outlaw Samaritan" played its second engagement here and was received with the same enthusiasm as marked Anderson's initial appearance in this feature, but Essanay's other reel, "The Gordian Knot," was rather foolish—more silly than impressive.

"Jimmy" pleased with his "Tricks" in Gaumont's picture, but the real feature of that reel was the "Oasis in the Desert," which was a delight. "Mother" was "Made Over" about the third or fourth time in this city, and the Kalem product certainly has impressed Hot Springs people as to how it is done. This illustrates the beautiful (?) and businesslike (?) advantage of all the houses using Trust pictures. The "repeaters," like death and creditors, are now sure things to bank on. Lubin sent in a merry comedy in "Wifey's New Hat" and the "New Operator" was a scream. Got sort o' lonesome when I saw old Market street, Philadelphia, in that reel. Pathe's "Switzerland" picture was intensely interesting, and its "Burning Arrow" reel was just as bad. Rather they had omitted this altogether. Pathe, go to Bison, American or Biograph if you want straight "dope" on how to fight Indians in moving pictures. Vitagraph's "Quaker Mother" pleased, and the "Latent Spark" aroused the audience to cheers. I do not know who the gentleman is who portrayed the tramp in that reel, but I have watched him with a great deal of interest in other pictures. His work is clean cut and artistic in everything he does. "The Widow Pohson's Husband" was also a big laugh, Vitagraph, and so was the pictorial story of the rich widow's troubles.

Those who enjoy the Independent output are awaiting with much interest the opening of the Princess, where the best of Imp and Bison reels will be shown.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

A NEW FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY

The St. Louis Motion Picture Company is now an assured fact, and indications are that Shamrock film will shortly take its place among the feature releases of the Independents.

Mr. O. E. Goebel, the president and executive head, representing the stockholders, has spared no expense in preparing the studio and factory for the work, which they hope will place them in the front rank, and with ample facilities and tried and experienced heads in their several departments, gives promise that Shamrock film will thrive and shed its brilliant color in the field of motion pictures for some time to come.

Representative players, recruited from the best-known studios, all of whom have a following among cinematograph patrons, are in daily rehearsal under alert direction.

Mr. G. P. Hamilton, manager of production, has things under thorough control, and able, competent assistants, skilled in the duties to which they are assigned, are immersed in preparations for their first release which will shortly be announced.

Milwaukee, Wis.—A $25,000 vaudeville and moving picture theater is being planned for 20th street and Fond Du Lac avenue.

Niles, Ohio.—Jack Stafford will erect a new theater on Furnace street.

Belfast, Me.—Walter J. Clifford will erect a new theater here to cost $8 000.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT

Washington, D. C.

On September 3d Tom Moore expects to inaugurate Sunday concerts of motion pictures at the Gaiety and Academy theaters. This will show the best output of the Independent companies, to be supplemented by excellent musical selections of vocal and instrumental order.

The Casino, one of our small vaudeville houses, is using first run reels, with changes twice a week.

A talk with Manager Lucas, of the Washington Film Exchange, revealed the fact that this office is using almost the entire output of Independent films. With September several new houses will be added to the list of this exchange.

During the recent run of Kinemacolor here a large force from Fort Meyer viewed these films and expressed wonder at the production. Manager Taylor extended an invitation to one hundred vacation inmates of Camp Good Will to witness the exhibition of Kinemacolor, and it is needless to say these mothers and children thoroughly enjoyed themselves, and profusely thanked Mr. Taylor for his kindness.

Manager Boernstein, of the Feature Film Company, and Stanley James, stage director of this firm, and at present with the local Columbia Players, have become frequent visitors to the Government Aviation Station at College Park, Md., where they have been doing some low flying stunts in the Rex Smith machine. They are not satisfied with this, and anticipate doing "something great" in the near future. "It is fine sport," declared Mr. Boernstein, "and I believe I will be able to make a cross-country flight soon." Surely, this is ambitious.

Dante's Inferno is having a week's run at the Belasco Theater, with two exhibitions daily. It is meeting with success, while the lecture and appropriate music adds much to the appreciation of the great literary masterpiece, and gives it an excellent setting.

The Howe Travel Festival again visited the Columbia Theater on Sunday last, with a full attendance. An auto trip through the Alps and Sidelights on Italy, India, The Grand Canyon of the Colorado, and views of our own city were among the interesting views shown.

To be up to date and to be at the lead of the line of the "March of Progress," advertising and publicity matters must be presented in attractive and advanced style. This is what the Publicity Committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Washington remembered in its recent meeting when it proposed to send on tour a series of motion picture reels and a competent lecturer to exploit the Capital City of our Republic. Exactly what company will take the pictures will not be determined until the middle of September, but there is much material that will interest people away from this city to be screened in Washington. The street life of the Capital, scenes in the Halls of Congress, how the money is made, and many other themes will be reproduced in the motion camera.

While advertising the National Capital, such a series of films will also be of immense educational value, and should be sought for presentation by colleges and institutions of education. Exactly how this project will be disseminated has not as yet been determined; whether the reels will go through the present channels of exchanges now established, or whether it will be an independent scheme operated directly from Washington.

Commenting on this plan, an editorial in the Washington Herald states: "Washington lends itself to the moving picture idea most admirably. It has beauty and picturesqueness and artistic quality. The panorama of its streets includes men distinguished in political and official life, whose names are household words. Washington news occupies a prominent place in every newspaper in the United States and stories of Washington events are eagerly read. Illustrations of Washington life would appeal to audiences everywhere.

"When the mountain would not come to Mahomet, he went to the mountain. As it is impossible for every American to see his capital, the city can be taken, in a pictorial sense, to every part of the country. Washington would be the gainer thereby, but none the less would a distinct advantage be afforded the men and women whose patriotic interest in the capital is intense, but whose opportunity to see the city never comes."

Exactly how the matter became public gossip has not been determined; but, anyway, it was rumored that a local firm would take motion pictures of Beulah Binford, who has figured so conspicuously as the "affinity" in the Beattie murder trial in Richmond. A visit to the only company of this character in Washington, that of the Feature Film Company, found Manager Boernstein in righteous indignation over the matter. Suffice it to say he emphatically said he would have nothing to do with such an unwholesome subject or character. The managers of the licensed and independent exchanges seemed to know little of any such negotiations with Miss Binford and gave assurance that no such films would be displayed in Washington.

For a while the better side of womanly instinct in the national capital was somewhat incensed over the matter; while it is scarcely possible the exhibitors would have desired such a reel for their screens.

Some have declared that it was newspaper invention or a desire for notoriety for the young lady in question; but there is a strong rumor that two film companies were contemplating negotiations for having Miss Binford before the motion camera. It is the desire of the few non-discriminating parties connected with the motion picture industry to accentuate or perpetuate unwholesome, notorious characters that causes outcries against the film theaters.

Omaha, Neb.—A moving picture theater to cost $4,500 is to be built at 24th and Lake Streets by J. Gregg and O. C. Fich.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Plans are being prepared by Shampan & Shampan for a new theater to be erected at Broadway and Varet Street.

Salem, Ore.—John F. Cordray has sold the Grand Opera House to F. L. Watters.

Racine, Wis.—A new vaudeville theater that will cost $70,000 will be erected at Main and State Streets.

Sunlap, Ia.—L. D. Cogswell has purchased the opera house here.

MR. INSISTER

MR. INSISTER says: If you want a lively Love-and-War story, INSIST on "The Buddhist Priestess"; if you want a strong Mother-Love story, INSIST on "In the Chorus"—you'll always find your pick in

THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12
See the Battle in the Temple

The Buddhist Priestess

was a mere pretty pink-and-white thing whose only care in the world was her pet doves, and yet whose simple nod meant death to the unfortunate who incurred her wrath. The monitor of the morals of thousands of human beings, hers was a high place and a pleasant one, and had she chosen to remain in it she would be there in pomp and state still. But all this high station and all this ease and plenty she gave over—for love of a stranger. He was a very dashing Yankee naval officer, and she fell head-over-heels in love with him and head-over-heels from her throne for him. But the picture leads you to suspect she was happier for the change. No. 245.

"THE BUDDHIST PRIESTESS"

"IN THE CHORUS"

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15
"And the Best Friend of All Is Mother"

In the Chorus

was where a mother found her long-lost daughter, in time to lead her from temptation and back to protecting hands. Also the finding led the mother herself back to the path that was narrow, and from which grief at her great loss had caused her to stay. The story is one of the most touching AND PLEASING we have ever filmed. It is difficult to make a heart-throb reel of this variety without a SURPLUS of sad things, but you really find such a reel here. It will cause some tears, but not enough to generate real gloom, and you needn't play any ragtime music to make your patrons forget its lesson. No. 246.

"THE BUDDHIST PRIESTESS"

Thanhouser Release, Sept. 12

A young missionary filled with religious fervor joyfully accepts the post to carry the gospel to a section of Japan where white men are not known. His wife and little daughter go with him, and he starts for his station with native guides and bearers.

When they have penetrated some distance into the interior, the missionary and his wife are stricken with the plague. Their native escorts, in fear, basely flee, leaving them helpless and alone in a strange deserted region.

The fleeing bearers pass a Buddhist temple, which they find for the moment unguarded. The scoundrels loot the temple, carrying off with them a jeweled idol.

The missionary and his wife die shortly, leaving the little child alone in a strange wilderness. She wanders off in the same direction as that taken by the bearers when they fled. She arrives at the temple shortly after the loss of the idol has been discovered by a Buddhist priest, who has rushed out to summon the natives. Finding a house, and hoping it contains people who can aid her, the little child enters the temple. She finds it deserted, but, worn out with her long walk, she sinks on the pillaged altar and falls asleep. When the priest and the natives return, they find a tiny kimono-clad creature on the altar, with a strangely beautiful white face. They at once decide that this must be their God, come to life, and bow down to her and offer her homage.

For ten years the little foreigner holds undisputed sway as priestess of the temple. At first she was too young to realize her position, and gradually her old life fades away, and seems but a dream. She could scarcely remember any life save the secluded one she led in the temple.

A young American naval officer, whose ship is temporarily anchored in the waters of Japan, gets shore leave for a day's hunting. He penetrates into the interior, shooting many strange wild birds. He aims at a bird on the wing, wounding it slightly, and is surprised to see it fly into a secluded dell. On following the bird, he finds himself outside the walled garden of the temple, and learns he has shot one of its sacred pigeons, which he finds being carefully tended by the beautiful young priestess. With this introduction, a friendship, which soon ripens into love, develops between the officer and the priestess. The pigeon which he wounded is trained to carry their love messages from the temple to the ship. The officer finally prevails upon his loved one to leave her temple and sail with him back to the land of her people. They are attacked by an indignant band of natives, who refuse to allow their priestess to be taken from them. The fugitives take refuge from the angry mob in the temple, from which place of safety they despatch the carrier pigeon to the ship with a message imploring help. The blue jackets get the message, and reach the temple in time to rescue their officer and his future bride from the hands of the natives.

"IN THE CHORUS"

Thanhouser Release, Sept. 15

A young widow is compelled because of her poverty to leave her only child, a little daughter, at a charitable institution, while she hunts for work. The child, punished because of some minor infraction of the rules, runs away, and takes refuge with a kindly old couple, who, being childless, welcome and finally adopt her. In the meantime the mother receives word from the asylum authorities that the little one has been lost and that everything indicates that she was drowned. The mother, alone in the world, has just secured a position in the chorus of a musical show, and tries to drown her sorrows in a life of gaiety.

Ten years later a theatrical manager, who stops by chance at a farm house, is charmed by the voice and beauty of a young girl he sees there. He offers her an engagement in one of his attractions, and the girl, dazzled by the thought of a life on the stage, gladly consents, and later appears in the city.

The mother is a member of the same chorus, and at first laughs at the new member of the cast and her shy country ways. She and the other girls induce the newcomer to attend a dinner which some men about town are giving, and laughs at her prim, high necked dress. On a sudden inspiration the mother offers to rearrange the girl's attire so that she will not look so "old-fashioned." Deftly she removes the yoke of the dress, and for the first time sees a scar on the girl's shoulder. A recollection of the fact that her own child was scalded on that same shoulder years before flashes through her brain. A few questions establish that her belief is correct. The mother recognizes the daughter, but the girl does not know her.

The mother's first thought is to save her daughter from treading the path she has followed. She induces her not to attend the dinner, and after the others have gone on jeeringly she paints to the frightened, innocent, country-bred child the pitfalls and dangers of a life in the chorus. She proves to her that she will be far happier with the people who have been so kind to her, and leads the girl back to her foster parents.

But the mother does not reveal her identity. She considers that she is not worthy to associate with the innocent young woman, and decides that it is her duty to disappear as soon as she has placed her in safety. She creeps into the girl's room at night, places a farewell message on her pillow, kisses her softly and steals out into the night alone, determined to lead a new life, and in time become worthy to reveal herself to the daughter she has lost, but found again.

"HOW POOR BABIES ARE REARED IN PARIS"

Eclair Release, Sept. 11

There are many institutions in Paris which reflect credit upon that renowned city. Foremost among these is the "Baby Home," which is noted for the care and attention afforded the little tots, and of which this film treats. We are invited to witness the bath and toilet of the little ones, and the daily weighing; we are shown how the babies learn to walk (an original course), and enjoy the pretty sight of the "Five O'Clock Recreation Dance." The film concludes with three charming scenes—"The Awakening of the Little Tots," "The Sandman," and "Dreamland!"

"HOW TEDDY LOST HIS BET"

Teddy, the champion cyclist, after a splendid victory, is celebrating with his friends. They come across a cripple upon whom the champion looks with disdain; the latter, however, causes surprise by challenging the famous cyclist. The idea is vociferously ridiculed by all except a stranger who offers to back the cripple with his bank roll. The professional finally accepts, and agrees to give the cripple a handicap of 500 yards. The start is made, and away goes the wonderful cripple, while the confident champion leisurely mounts his wheel and follows. The cyclist meets with unthought-of obstacles en route, over and through which his rival has adroitly wended his way. Bruised and panting, Teddy at last reaches the goal, just in time to witness the triumph of his competitor, for the crippled sport knew the road best—and Teddy had lost his bet!

"BY THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT"

Imp Release, Sept. 11

A story in which the mythical characters in the Mother Goose Melodies appear in a drama.

Purity, a bond girl, is discovered intently poring over a volume of the Nursery Rhymes while seated in the garden of her mistress, caring for a child. She is discontented with her lot and longs for an adventure such as she has read about.

Suddenly an old hag appears to her out of space, and asks for food. Purity, in the goodness of her heart, brings her the viands and the woman is instantly transformed to the richly attired old lady of Banbury Cross, kind and indulgent. She announces she has been commissioned by Old King Cole, of nursery rhyme fame, to find a bride for his son among the mortals and she has selected Purity, as she is beautiful and meets all the requirements. She administers a sleeping potion to the girl that causes her soul to leave her body and, clapping her hands, her white horse appears accoutred for a trip to fairyland.

Seated behind the Old Lady of Banbury Cross, Purity is transported to the unknown realm. Here Purity meets all the characters mentioned in the nursery rhymes. The prince, the son of Old King Cole, immediately falls in love with Purity, as the old woman of Banbury Cross has conspired with Cupid to pierce the heart of the prince with an arrow. The wicked queen of the gnomes, however, is in love with the Prince, and she induces Taffy, the Welchman, who is a thief, to steal the heart of the prince.

The prince is transformed from a lovable young man to an individual without a heart and declines to marry the little maid from the earth. This angers Old King Cole and he sends his retainers to bring the Queen and Taffy. They are led by Little Boy Blue and, after a short struggle, the capture is made. The heart is of no use to the Queen, as it has been rent in twain by the arrow of Cupid.

Taffy and the Queen are condemned to be hanged, but Purity intercedes for them and the King grants them mercy and they are commanded to leave the domain. Purity and the Prince are married amid pomp and splendor and are supposed to live happily ever afterward.

"THE BROTHERS"

Imp Release, Sept. 14

The story is laid in Ireland and the characters are all typical of the "old sod."

Patrick Curran and Dennis O'Day both love the handsome and vivacious Rose Grady, who is something of a flirt, and keeps her lovers in suspense. Father Curran, the priest, a brother of Patrick, looks earnestly after his flock, which has in it several men who are bent on whiling away their time at the public house in drinking and games. Shamus McCarty is the village drunkard and causes the priest much concern to keep him sober.

There is a love scene between Patrick and Rose and Dennis appears on the scene. The rivalry is bitter and hasty words are spoken. An encounter is imminent when Father Curran comes on the scene and acts as peacemaker. At his request the lovers shake hands and are once more friends.

Proceeding on his way Father Curran finds Shamus under the influence of tipple and he takes his bottle away and lectures him on the evils of the drink habit. The father returns home and seated by the fire lights his pipe and dozes. His sleep is disturbed by a horrid dream.

Patrick and Dennis fight over the favors of Rose and Dennis is thrown over a cliff. Patrick takes refuge in the house of his brother and when the excited villagers come for him the priest tells them he is not there and they go away. Shamus, the drunkard, believes Father Curran is telling a falsehood and he returns and sees Patrick through the window. He conceives a plan to get even with the priest. He rushes to the crowd, tells them of his discovery and then sneaks to the house and sets it on fire.

Father Curran awakes with a start to find it all a dream.

Patrick and Rose come in for his blessing and there is a comedy scene with Shamus. The priest is relieved, but discovers that his pipe has set fire to a newspaper, the smoke having filled the room, probably suggesting the firing of the house by the tippler in his dream.

"RED FEATHER'S FRIENDSHIP"

Powers Release, Sept. 5

Red Feather, an Indian brave, is attacked by a half breed enemy, but is saved by the owner of a nearby ranch, who takes Red Feather to his home and puts him to work on the ranch, for which Red Feather swears eternal friendship. Tom Hogan, foreman of the ranch, endeavors to make love, first to the ranchman's wife and then to Red Feather's squaw. Red Feather finds it out, tells the ranchman, who thrashes Hogan and drives him from the ranch, making Red Feather the foreman. Hogan for revenge entices the ranchman's wife away by sending a letter purporting to come from Red Feather's squaw, asking her to come to a mountainous retreat where she has met with an accident. On her arrival Hogan captures her. In the meantime the ranchman and Red Feather find the letter, take the trail and arrive on the scene as Hogan tries to force his unwelcome attentions on his former employer's wife. A shot from Red Feather's weapon gives Hogan his just deserts and the Indian repays his debt.

"THE TWIN SQUAWS"

Powers Release, Sept. 9

Prairie Wolf and Golden Rod, "twin squaws," are in love with two Indian braves. Sam Jones, a cowboy, is discharged from the ranch for drunkenness. He joins an Indian tribe and becomes a renegade. He is discovered trying to make love with both the squaws and is severely chastised by one of the braves, who would have killed him but for the other Indian's interference, who informs him that he is a member of the tribe. The Indian brave lets him go with the warning that if he ever attempts to insult Prairie Wolf again he will kill him. The renegade for revenge sends a letter to the ranchman's daughter enticing her away. He also entices the twin squaws and one of the braves to the same place. He captures and drives them all at the point of a gun to the mouth of the bear pit, where he is about to plunge them all to their death, when Blue Eagle, the other Indian brave, who has taken the trail, arrives. He kills the renegade, rescues the twin squaws and saves the ranchman's daughter.

"LITTLE DOVE'S ROMANCE"

Bison Release, Sept. 5

Burns is hunting in the woods and fires as Little Dove comes riding up. The report startles her horse and it wheels suddenly, throwing the girl to the ground. Burns carries her to his camp, nearby, and he and his friend bandage her sprained ankle. Her tribe misses her and trails her to the camp, where an attack is prevented by Little Dove, who explains that the white men are her friends. She falls in love with Burns, who does not encourage her. The white men depart and Little Dove's sadness is pathetic, but she finally accepts the love of an Indian brave.

"A WESTERN TRAMP"

Bison Release, Sept. 8

The tramp is made the butt of the cowboys' rough jokes. He discovers a plot by which Smith is trying to make Mrs. Jones believe that her husband is in love with a dance-hall girl, and persuades the girl to confess to Mrs. Jones the part she played in trying to inveigle Jones into a compromising situation. Smith is run out of town by Jones, and the tramp is given a good home as a reward.

"TEMPTATION"

Reliance Release, Sept. 6

Jasper, a clerk, is the husband of a beautiful woman who is dissatisfied with her husband's income, as she longs for pretty clothes. She receives an invitation to a wedding and poutingly deplores her shabby gown.

The husband grieves over his inability to satisfy his wife's cravings for finery. That day, a Saturday, he is sent to the bank to make a deposit of a large sum of money and arrives as the doors have closed. Returning to the works he finds that closed. He is therefore compelled to guard the money until Monday. As he walks down the street some beautiful gowns in a modiste's shop attract his attention, and he pauses to look at them, sadly deploring his inability to purchase them for his wife.

Suddenly an idea strikes him. If he can make away with the money without suspicion to himself he can make his wife happy. He enters a telegraph office and sends himself a telegram purporting to come from a friend leaving for San Francisco and requesting him to meet the sender in the lobby of the Astor Hotel at ten o'clock.

At home he shows his wife the money and places it in the sideboard. The telegram is delivered and he hands it to her. She objects to his going away and leaving her alone with so much money in the house, but he insists that he must meet the man.

An automobile is coming rapidly down the street. A wandering peddler is wearily walking along the sidewalk. At a street crossing the automobile turns, striking the peddler and hurling him to the roadside. The automobile disappears from view, and the injured man painfully gets up and drags himself up the steps of the Jasper home, in front of which the accident has occurred.

Mrs. Jasper hears the noise on her porch, and when the peddler knocks she opens the door with a revolver in her hand. The man staggers into the room and his battered appearance wins her sympathy. She permits him to go upstairs to bathe and bandage his wounds and to lie down in the spare room. As a precaution until her husband returns she locks the hall door leading from above.

Nervously anxious about the money, Mrs. Jasper does not retire. Jasper, waiting until a late hour, thinking his wife asleep, stealthily approaches the house and effects an entrance through a window. The man upstairs, unable to sleep from pain, hears the light footsteps on the porch and listening intently hears the faint sound of Jasper's entrance. In the meantime Mrs. Jasper hears the man at the window, and securing her revolver turns the light out.

The peddler taps on the locked door, and excitedly tells Mrs. Jasper what he has heard. She fears to let him into the room, but in the face of the danger from the man working at the window, she decides to trust the peddler, and opening the door slips the revolver into his hand.

Jasper enters and goes direct to the hiding place of the money. The peddler fires and Jasper drops. When the lights are turned on Mrs. Jasper is horrified to find it is her husband, and the bullet wound in his arm is tenderly bandaged and a doctor sent for.

When the doctor arrives he is suspicious, and asks questions which are embarrassing, and the peddler steps forward and concocts a story to the effect that Jasper mistook him for a burglar and attacked him, and that he was compelled to shoot Jasper to save his life. The doctor wants to call the police, but the Jaspers persuade him that it was all an accident.

Mrs. Jasper has learned a great lesson, for all the money in the world would not make her happy if her husband was a thief. She tells him so, and Monday morning he goes to work, turns in the money, and as he sits at his desk and realizes what a narrow escape he has had he thanks Providence that he is still honest, and no temptation can thereafter lead him astray.

"TWEEDLEDUM AND THE ADVENTURESS"

Ambrosio Release, Sept. 6

Tweedledum learns of a wealthy man who is held for ransom by an adventuress and when she attempts to beguile another victim he warns him and, playing detective, impersonates him. The women overhears the plot, and when Tweedledum calls she dresses in male attire and engages him in conversation. Suddenly a trap door opens and Tweedledum is dropped to the cellar, placed in a sack and cast in the river. He manages to free himself and, disguised as the maid-servant, effects an entrance, arrests the woman and releases the imprisoned man.

On the same reel is "Italian Artillery," showing interesting evolutions of the Italian artillery on the snow-covered peaks of the Alps.

"THE FLOWER OF THE TRIBE"

Nestor Release, Sept. 6

Having failed to buy Silver Star, the chief's daughter, Jesse Emmett, assisted by his friend, Decker, has succeeded, after a desperate fight with the redskins, in which the old chief was mortally wounded, in carrying her away by force. However, the young braves, who had given chase to the white renegades, so severely wounded Emmett that he was forced to seek shelter in Dan Spencer's shack. Here he explained that Silver Star was his wife. But while grandmother Spencer was binding up his wounds the Indian maiden whispered the true state of affairs to little Vera, and, as a result, the renegade, taken wholly by surprise, was quickly driven out at the point of a gun.

Luckily, 'ere he could attack them through the window, Roy Spencer appeared. An exciting encounter took place, in which Roy proved victor, greatly to the relief of Silver Star, who at once hastened back to the Indian encampment, to apprise them of her welfare.

To her sorrow, the maiden found her father dead, while the new chief had already ordered a war dance, and stubbornly refused to believe her story that the settlers had proven themselves her staunch friends. The old chief's death must be avenged, he declared, and accordingly ordered Silver Star placed in her tepee under guard.

Realizing that unless she warned her new friends they would all be massacred, the maiden quickly feigned illness; then, while her guard ran for help, slipped stealthily out, mounted a horse, and had not only notified the Spencers, but Roy had already galloped away for assistance ere the Indians crept into sight. Dan Spencer had but his old mother and little daughter to assist him in defending their shack, yet so true was his aim that he succeeded in keeping the Indians at bay until Roy with the other settlers dashed up to his rescue and drove the redskins away.

Silver Star had paid her debt of gratitude,—she had saved her friends' lives, even at the cost of her own people.

"MUTT AND JEFF AND THE ESCAPED LUNATIC"

Nestor Release, Sept. 9

Mutt and Jeff are seen in their room, confronted with the serious problem of procuring breakfast. After some very deep thought, Mutt hits on a plan, and Jeff is dispatched to a neighboring grocery store, full of instructions as to how to bring home the eggs, to say nothing of "the bacon."

No distance is too short, it seems, to provide adventures for this adventurous little cuss, and the usual comical situations and obstacles appear, and are also, as usual, met and overcome in the usual comical manner.

Returning to the expectant and hungry Mutt, picture Jeff's dismay and Mutt's disgust upon the discovery that the purloined hen fruit is "of a vintage," and has acquired everything in the way of odor to offend the sensitive nostrils of Mutt. Jeff "gets his."

They must eat, however, and it's up to Mutt. A newspaper "ad" for waiters catches his eye and looks good to him; waiters surely have a chance to eat. So sallying forth, hopeful and determined, the café in question is reached and jobs secured, and then trouble and fun begin and things move fast and furiously, climaxed by the arrival of an escaped lunatic—with an appetite. Jeff, in the meantime, has been made chef, the former incumbent having been removed through the machinations of Mr. Mutt.

The lunatic engages the funny fellows as his personal body guard, with promise of large sums of money in return for faithful service, which is eagerly pledged by the enthusiastic Mutt. The arrival of the keepers from the asylum is the signal for a general mix-up. The head-waiter decides that everybody is crazy, and even fears for his own mental equilibrium, if the new help is not immediately disposed of.

On his complaint, Mutt and Jeff are also seized as lunatics, and in a frenzy of funny fits are dragged off to the foolish factory. This is one of the best of the "Mutt and Jeff" pictures, which, by the way, are showing marked improvement with each succeeding release. Their popularity is still growing, and deservedly so.

"A DREAM WITH A LESSON"

Great Northern Release, Sept. 9

A poor student is preparing himself for the medical profession. He cannot join in the pleasures of his fellow students on account of his poverty. A cousin who loves him brings fruit and flowers, and as he is bidding her adieu at the door his attention is attracted by a crowd of street urchins annoying a fashionably dressed and beautiful young woman. He goes to her aid, and is rewarded by a smile of gratitude and a flower from her corsage. Going back to his room, he listens at the partition to his neighbor, a rich old miser, counting his wealth. Getting out of his window, he creeps along to the window of the adjoining room and sees the old man with his money. Instantly the desire to possess it and thus satisfy his ambitions comes over him, but he thrusts the idea aside and goes back to his room. Here he falls asleep, and we see his dream vividly portrayed. He fancies that he has gone back to the neighbor's room, strangled his victim and stolen his wealth. Then he goes to a fashionable restaurant, and meets his fair charmer once more. After a time he returns home, and again creeps to the old man's room, where he sees the police investigating the case. They discover him at the window and go to arrest him, and in his haste to escape he falls to the ground. The shock awakens him, and he discovers to his great joy that 'twas all a dream.

"CHARLIE'S BUTTE"

Champion Release, Sept. 11

George Hamilton, a southerner, his wife and family and colored servant have emigrated and settled in the great West. It is the period before the Civil War, but Charley, the servant, has long since been a free man, the boon of freedom being granted by his kind master for his loyalty.

One day a note comes to Hamilton; the contents were startling: "The Indians are on the warpath. Make for the fort." No time was to be lost, for the fort was many miles distant. The horses were harnessed, everyone was mounted, all ready to start, but stop! Where was Dorothy Hamilton? The joy and pride of the region had been momentarily forgotten. The anxious parents were soon quieted when Charley appeared with the "little missy" in hand. He placed the child before him on his horse and the cavalcade started.

Only a few miles had been covered when the clattering of hoofs was faintly heard. The spurs were applied to their frightened beasts and the race for life was begun. All seemed well until it was seen that Charley's animal was beginning to lag. He spurred the horse onward, but to no purpose. The mother looked back with agonizing expression, crying, "Oh my baby!" "Oh my baby!"

Charley heard the wild whoop of the Indians not a hundred yards off. He knew it was impossible for the horse to gain the fort with its double burden. Each second heightened the danger. His mind was now made up. He dismounted, and, striking the beast, sent it forward with his "little missy."

Then, flinging himself behind a rock, he halted the onrush of the now thoroughly infuriated savages, who saw their beautiful prey slipping from their grasp. Crack! Crack! his weapons flashed, and each bullet found its mark in redman's breast. Meanwhile Dorothy and her parents had eluded harm and reached the fort. They told their tale, and a company of troopers rode out to the succor of heroic Charley. But when they reached him, his bruised and disfigured body met their gaze. He had given his life for little Dorothy, the prairie flower.

"THE RED DEVILS"

Champion Release, Sept. 13

The great Western drama by Sidney Drew, American actor and playwright. The story is a beautiful one, dealing with a soldier's love for a charming queen of the sawdust ring.

Vast crowds of soldiers and civilians are seen entering the circus grounds, fronting the spread of canvas. We enter and see that which has a charm for us all, the circus sawdust ring. We behold with delight the antics of the clown, while the ringmaster, handsomely arrayed, struts about in lordly style.

Then the Red Devils rush on; they are four acrobats who perform in quick succession, head stands, neck throws, ground and lofty tumbling, and other daring acrobatic feats. Then dashes on the loveliest of women, in face and figure, bestriding a noble horse of creamy hue, and all loudly applaud. Later we peep into the dressing rooms of the performers, which puts us in touch with the heart of the play. We then see the picturesque caravan on its way, with the old familiar stage coach, carrying on top and inside the circus troupe.

Suddenly we are startled by a sudden onslaught by Indians upon the coach. Death seems imminent. At this juncture, "The Red Devils" leap from the coach and by the performance of their circus stunts, amaze the painted savages, thus arresting their attack for the time being. In the meantime, a body of U. S. Cavalry arrive, in response to a message sent to her sweetheart by the fair circus rider, and the Indians are put to flight.

At the head of the gallant troops rides the handsome soldier whose heart had been lost in the sawdust arena. By this time he has won his prize and placed the circlet of gold upon her finger. The troops, trained cavalrymen every one of them, dashing from their barracks, the Indian attacks and counter charges, the cowpunchers, the circus performers and the Western breath of atmosphere all go to make up a most remarkable photoplay.

The exchanges will furnish the corresponding sheet music to be rendered with the film, "The Red Devils," free of charge.

"TANGLED HEARTSTRINGS"

Yankee Release, Sept. 11

Mrs. Dane, a wealthy and beautiful widow, becomes interested in the son of her gardener who is of a studious nature and is ambitious to become a lawyer. He is discovered by Mrs. Dane diligently studying law books of ancient origin, as he is unable to obtain more up-to-date books, which are quite expensive. He is also encouraged in his work by his sweetheart, a little country girl, whom he had loved since childhood days.

Mrs. Dane finally decides upon sending the young man to a New York law school and after all arrangements have been made he leaves the country, bidding a fond farewell to his benefactress, sweetheart and father.

A year later he has become one of the brightest students of the term and visits his benefactress and tells her of the success of his recent examination. Mrs. Dane's admiration for the stalwart young student soon turns to love, which the young student reciprocates. A former suitor of Mrs. Dane, jealous of this fact, notifies the student's father, who comes to the city and pleads with Mrs. Dane to give up his son and permit him to return to his former sweetheart, who is heartbroken at Tom's silence.

Mrs. Dane complies with the father's request and although she loves Tom dearly she notifies him that she no longer loves him. When Tom receives this message he obtains a large sum of money and entering the home of Mrs. Dane while a reception is in progress he denounces her and throws the money at her, exclaiming "I want you all to see that I repay this woman; she made me love her and then threw me away like a wasted plaything."

Two years later Tom's sweetheart dies and he learns the truth from Mrs. Dane, who, while his sweetheart lived, kept silent. Tom then realizes how cruel he had been to a noble and unselfish woman. Loving him as she does, Mrs. Dane finds it quite easy to forgive him and cheerfully consents to become the wife of her former ward, now a successful lawyer.

"WOMAN"

Woman's inconsistency plays an important part in this story. Living a frivolous butterfly life, Eleanor Summerville cannot sacrifice her pleasure loving habits for the sake of love and refuses the offer of marriage of Frederick Robinson, but becomes the wife of Count von Bulow.

When she hears of Robinson's success in the financial world, where he is known as one of America's multi-millionaires, she regrets her decision of having married the nobleman and notwithstanding the fact that Robinson is married she decides upon winning him away from his wife. Although Robinson shows her time and again that he does not care for her, she, with the devilish cunning, traps him into a compromising position, and is discovered by her husband, who immediately issues a challenge to the man he thinks has ruined his home.

Finding that the lives of two good men are at stake, she regrets her conduct and does everything in her power to stop the duel. The duel is fought and Robinson is wounded. In her efforts to stop the duel she meets with a serious accident from which she cannot recover.

She confesses to her husband and exonerates Robinson of all blame. She does not survive from the shock and accident and after receiving forgiveness from those she had wronged she dies, praying for forgiveness from the Higher Power.

"PICTURESQUE COLORADO"

Rex Release, Sept. 7

When nature finished the rest of the world, she took all the colors left on her palette and generously and recklessly threw them into that spot of the earth that is now Colorado (given that name for that very reason). Eventable riot of awe-compelling color, a blending of almost sacred beauty, Colorado is nature's masterpiece. The rainbow and an Italian sunset all frozen into the everlasting hills—the matchless granite hues soothe yet stir one to the unknown depth as their sublime spell falls upon us. We unconsciously acknowledge the majesty of nature and her supremacy over merely human artists. They are psalms and a sermon in stone.

As we stand in the Garden of the Gods, looking at the weirdly wondrous figures carved by the great sculptor, we forget our petty cares and paltry woes, our yearnings and our hopes or despairs, our conquests or defeats, for we are in divine presence, selfishness and avarice are forgotten for we are with beauty and our own heart and soul and mind become beautified. Colorado's charm is at once a respiration and an inspiration.

Poets of song and nature's genius have been inspired to dream, dare an achievement through the mighty sight of the wonders of nature. Artists have vainly attempted to translate on canvas a picture of picturesque Colorado. Rex has accomplished with the aid of science what artists have failed to produce.

"BILL BUYS A LOBSTER"

Lux Release, Sept. 8

Despite the severity of his weekly adventures recently, little Bill is here to cheer us once more with his frolicsome escapades. We see him seated tete-a-tete with a very pretty girl, indulging in the luxury of a particularly magnificent lobster for dinner. It is, of course, quite inconceivable that Bill should do anything without its having some astonishing consequence, and the effect of the succulent crustacean is in no wise disappointing. Immediately he finishes his repast, Bill is seized with most alarming spasms, and then, apparently taking on the habits of the shellfish he devoured, commences to walk backwards out of the room. Tripping up at the top of the stairs, he falls down head foremost and then leaps backward into the street, where he seeks refuge in a waiting carriage. But no sooner has he done so than the horse begins jibbing, and is not stopped until the angry driver expels poor Bill from the vehicle. Bill's experiences on horseback are equally thrilling, and result eventually in his being cast off backwards after a marvelous backward ride. Still in a state of invertion, he collided with the tables of a café and brings down the wrath of the proprietor upon his head. At last, however, he manages to steer himself home, where he is met on the dorstep by Mrs. Bill, who affectionately gathers him up in her arms and departs indoors.

"THE ROMANCE OF A WAGER"

The Hon. Percival Malpas remarks to his friends upon human charity. No argument will convince him that the public are really generous, until at last his friend, Lord Ponteport, wages five thousand dollars that he will solicit alms as a beggar and live for one month upon the proceeds of same. Lord Ponteport then disguises himself as a vagrant and repairs to a church. At first he is successful, but later comes to grief and is thrown into a prison cell as a robber, but, the stipulated time of the disguise being up, he is able to throw off his disguise, and the error is soon righted. We later see him going to the lady of his choice, but not for alms this time, but for something dearer.

Here Is Something Entirely New

You have never seen anything like it before, and why? Because it is the only Collection of its kind ever published, and it is going to fill a long felt want. It is a Collection that will appeal to thousands of pianists who play in moving picture theatres.

HAVILAND'S
MOVING PICTURE PIANIST'S ALBUM

It contains the music that every pianist needs in a moving picture house. It is "Classified," so that at a moment's notice you can find the particular style or class of music you need for a particular picture.
Sixty pages of music, covering everything needed in a picture house—full sheet music size—arranged simply, yet brilliantly. Nothing in this Collection more difficult than third grade. Anyone can play these arrangements.

The Price is 50 Cents Postpaid.

OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT

London Office of the News,
8 Sherwood St., London, W.,

I am glad to report that close on £70 was raised by the fund for the benefit of the widow and children of the late Mr. T. Clegg.

The British & Colonial Kinematograph Co., now well established in a new studio and factory, are already beginning to justify my prediction that their new subjects would mark a great advance. "A Soldier's Honour" is capital, as is "The King's Peril," both of these subjects being acted and staged with thoroughness which the producers of neither America nor the Continent could better. "B. & C." employ some big casts, too, in their recent issue, the drumming out scene, in 'Soldier's Honour," is a very ambitious piece of work.

I am sorry to learn that Mr. E. J. Muddle, Editor of "The Bioscope," has been compelled to relinguish his position by the orders of his doctor, who, I understand, recommends an outdoor occupation. Mr. Muddle had more to do than any one with putting the "Bioscope" on its feet and will be greatly missed, though I understand he will still contribute to his old paper. I hope to hear of his early and complete restoration to health.

Itala had a bad stroke of luck at the end of last week, when their studio and factory was the scene of a conflagration. First reports said the place was gutted and Tyler's contemplated postponing all Itala releases, but, happily, things turned out not to be so bad as reported. This week's subjects were printed in England and Itala re-organized their works with such rapidity that the announcement is made that production will now continue with usual regularity.

MURDER, CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE!

Sure it is not criminal negligence to put your theatre patrons in stalls that they can't get out of in case of fire, but, Mr. Exhibitor, don't you think you would feel better to have your theatre seated with an Automatic Folding, All-Aisle Chair?

LISTEN

Our chair is a friend to the Public.
It advertises your theatre and makes your business grow.
It is a space-saver, life-saver, money-saver. Gives 25 per cent more seating.

IT IS THE ONLY SANITARY CHAIR

It will make your theatre all aisles.
It is the world's greatest theater chair, perfected to the highest degree.
Twelve years' experience and scientific study of the theater seating problem is embodied in the construction of this wonderful chair. PATENTED.

If you can't get TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK at the price you are paying Pay A Little More!

Let the Imps pull you out of the hole!

They will do it quicker and better than any other brand of film. Imp films cost more to produce than any others. They show more thought, more care, more expert handling, more careful editing. Advertise the fact that you show two Imps every week and you will give your competitor a body blow, no matter what brand he may be using. Keep everlastingly at your exchange till you get two Imps every week. If you can't accomplish that point by any other method, then pay a little more. Get together with your exchange right now! Plan for the biggest Fall and Winter business of your career!

"By the House That Jack Built"

The Lie

You know the harmless, foolish liar, who hasn't got brains enough to tell one that you can't immediately spot as an unprincipled whopper. We never mind him. But the crafty, malicious liar—the brainy, sneaky proposition that plots with the cleverness worthy of a nobler cause—that is the menace with which our story deals. But in addition to his character, he plays his hand in the guise of friendship. Now put two and two together, and add to it the splendid acting of the Thanhouser Stock, with our never-failing photography. That's no "haker's half-dozen!" No. 247. Code Word, Thel.

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22

The Honeymooners

Mayhe you have already heen there yourself—and perhaps not. At any rate, your most throbbing reminiscences of honeymoon excitement can never present to you such a picture as that of this couple. Their friends are not what might be termed cruel—just delightfully wicked; and what they forgot to perpetrate on the newly-weds was not worth while. Oh—one thing we almost forgot—the couple used brains, too, and made things more lively hut none the less interesting by their clever scheme to avoid the maelstrom of joyful nuisance. So it's wits against wits, and the sum total is a hunch of fun. Ask Mr. Insister. No. 248. Code Word, Heho.

A WORD TO DIRECTORS

WE have often wondered how the moving picture directors stand a word of criticism, and many times we have been inclined to point out some of the incongruities they allow to creep into their pictures. We are not now speaking of any one firm because all are tarred with the idiosyncracies of their directors. We therefore leave each director to find the flaws in his own pictures, and if this friendly critcism will help him, we are sure each and all are welcome.

First let us take Indian pictures. We find some Indians with clubs, some with bows and arrows, and some with Lee-Metford rifles. Now, how on earth can these three articles be used by one tribe of Indians? And such clubs—an Indian would never see the like. They are only used as a blackthorn shillelah in Donnybrook Fair. The bows and arrows never saw an Indian encampment, and must have been purchased in some of the toy shops round the cities—and very cheap at that. Then Messrs. Directors, please tell us how it is possible for Indians of fifty or sixty years ago to ever catch hold of a Martini-Henry, or a Lee-Metford, or one of the new regulation repeating rifles used by the United States Government. We are a thorough believer in spooks, and in race tribes, and we know spooks are to a large extent very forward, but not to the extent of getting these articles for their tribes fifty years before they are manufactured.

Another point. Why, in the make-up of all your Indians, do you use white men—and such bow-legged beggars some of them are! Their faces are typical of raw Irish and German descent, and some of them look as if they had been closely allied to the rum barrel. An Indian is clean cut, upright as a dart, sinewy and lithe; he would scorn to wince, or run away like some of your Indians are depicted as doing. They are fighting, so that their flight to the "Happy Hunting Ground" may be sure; no coward gets there.

Again, why are some of your pictures so unfinished in the details of the story; why do you put heroines of the plains in high-heeled boots of 1911 when they represent back fifty years ago? The ladies' dresses are the same, showing the same inconsistency, and some of the men's make-up showing the patches are very laughable to one who can see, and let me tell you that the audiences are not half so green as you think they are.

Again, why do you break off the scenes in the middle of an exciting spisode? Is it because you are short of money, or film, to finish? Of course, human nature is human nature, but business before pleasure is the rule, and where artistic quality is desired. Love, the tricky god, must take a back seat and not be pushed forward to fill roles that are utterly impossible, that are more capable of being filled by the girl in the background.

There are two or three more grumbles we have in mind but this is enough for the present.

DAME RUMOR

IT has been whispered about that the Edison talking pictures are not a success, and that Mr. Edison is as far from the dream of his ideals in that respect as he ever was. Also it has become known that Mr. Edison took a journey to France this past summer in order to buy up a process for colored moving pictures which also was found to fall short of expectations—so much so that the large headline articles for use in the newspaper offices here are still lying in their nooks in peaceful repose, blissfully ignorant of the fact that their mission on this planet is practically at an end. So says Dame Gossip.

Upon the failures of the greater is based the courage of the lesser—the lesser that some day may be destined to change places with the greater. We glory not in the failures of anyone to accomplish anything worth while. In fact, we are conscious that a failure placed in the right hands is but a stepping stone to greater achievements.

STEALING A NAME

SHAKESPEARE once said "Who steals my purse steals trash, but he who filches me of my good name——." Our readers can fill in the quotation themselves. We are very much puzzled to know why a name should be pirated, or stolen, to boost a certain make of film instead of the makers adopting a new name. Not only do they steal the name, but they steal the trade mark, and our English contemporary carried the advertisement of a stolen trade mark and a company working under false pretenses. Not that the name in itself was of any value, because it was only synonymous with punk film, and they were glad not only to drop the name but also the make of the film attached to it, and if the present stealers of the name turn out film no better than the original makers, the name will be synonymous with its predecessors (punk and junk). But there may be another phase to this question, and that is, queries are sent to us asking: If the Atlas Film Company now advertising in some of the papers belongs to the Sales Company? We want to most emphatically assert it does not belong to the Sales Company, nor will the Sales Company have anything whatever to do with the company using the name at present; we want to caution our readers not to be misled by such a specious illegitimate form of advertising.

THE BROTHERS

THE BROTHERS, illustrated on front cover, is the title of a very pleasing story filmed by the Imp Company and for release Thursday, September 14. It is a story of Ireland and fairly bristles with the atmosphere of the "Ould sod." Two men, brothers, figure prominently in the story, one being a priest and the other the accepted sweetheart of a pretty colleen. There is a rival for the affections of the girl, and thereby hangs the tale. The priest is aware of the rivalry and is fearful his hotheaded brother will commit some overt act. He broods over this, and dropping asleep, has a dream in which he sees his brother attack the rival and hurl him over a cliff. He dreams he is forced to tell a falsehood in order to shield the brother and that his parishioners, aroused to fury and resentment, attempt to burn his house for revenge. He awakens and is happy to discover it is all a dream. He finds the brother and the rival have adjusted their quarrel and are friends. There is an excellent comedy vein in the introduction of a queer character who takes a drop too much at times notwithstanding the vigilance of the priest, who is fond of games and athletics but will not tolerate tippling in his flock. The story is entertaining and the plot cleverly interpreted.

CHAS. K. HARRIS

By Margaret A. Macdonald

MY message was conveyed by some mysterious means to the inner room. Charles K. Harris had pressed the button of the automatic door opener which hangs limply at the side of his desk; click, click! The door opened and I was ushered by the pleasant-mannered stenographer into the presence of the world-famous writer of popular songs. "Mr. Harris?" I ventured timidly, for it was my very first glimpse of the writer of "After the Ball," "One Night in June," "Will the Roses Bloom in Heaven," etc. I walked into a room and a presence which was neutral to me, save for the products that had come from the heart and brain of the man. My recollection, as I think of them now, is as the fragrance of roses and fresh blown violets, of a sympathy grown warm through contact with human life—rich, red, throbbing human life—its joys and its grievances. "Everything that I write must throb with life," said Mr. Harris. "It must have a moral—it must be a real living thing that touches the hearts of the people."

Mr. Harris, strange to say, knows not one note of music. He writes his lyrics and music at one and the same time. The muse of music and the muse of poetry go hand in hand. Humming snatches of different songs, he showed me how the theme of the song had called forth the melody—how, in other words they were part and parcel of the same thing.

Charles K. Harris gets near the hearts of the people. He writes pure, simple melodies, which for their very simplicity, and sympathy with the lines which they accompany, steal in and around us like a warm, soft current of life, entering into our present conditions as something fitted there, or calling up reminiscences of the past with its varied emotions.

"I've heard my songs sung in German, Italian, French and English—they sound just the same to me. I don't care whether they are sung in a moving picture house, a cafe or any other place—I am perfectly indifferent—they can do what they like with them," said Mr. Harris, during our conversation.

"Moving pictures?" he answered, to a query with regard to the use of his songs for moving picture theaters. "There is not one of my songs that could not be used for the theme of a moving picture. I have had them come to me already for ideas. They need new ideas, and if they are anxious to exclude the immoral element, as they say they are, and introduce only the good and the pure, let them take some of the simple little song subjects and work them out. For instance, take "After the Ball," have the picture of the old man, and the little child at his knee asking him to tell it a story, then follow up with all the different scenes of the song, the grand ballroom, etc., and they will get a very beautiful picture. The same can be done with many other songs."

There is a very beautiful story connected with "Will the Roses Bloom in Heaven?" By glancing at the title page you will find that it has been dedicated to a clergyman, Rev. Leslie Clare Manchester. The following is how the inspiration to write the song came to the writer, as told by Mr. Harris himself. "One day I received a letter from this man from the South where he had gone for his health. It ran something like this: A young girl from my congregation was afflicted with consumption. At last as she became worse, I felt it my duty to take her South. Each morning I used to bring her a little bunch of roses fresh from the garden. One day I took them for the last time—so it was destined. She said to me after I had given them to her, "Will the roses bloom in Heaven?" Since her death I have been obliged to come here for my health, having been so overcome by the incident. Will you perpetuate this idea in song?' and that is where I got my inspiration for the song, 'Will the Roses Bloom in Heaven.'"

Continuing, he spoke of the Geidel trial, and the mother's words, "If boys could but read their mother's hearts they would never go wrong." Said he: "You see on my desk here the words written down." He therewith picked up the paper upon which they were written, or words to that effect; my memory may not serve me exactly eorrect. which had been lying directly in front of him. "this will be the theme for perhaps my next song. I served on the jury at the Wolter trial, and these things touch me very deeply."

During my conversation with him, Mr. Harris laughingly told many interesting things in connection with the interviews which he had granted abroad. At last, after being tormented almost to exasperation, he said to the "end fellow," "I don't see why the mischief you don't have one man write it up for the whole bunch of you instead of prodding me on the installment plan."

Mr. Harris spoke with delight of his recent trip abroad, and of the "New York microbe" which takes possession of New Yorkers who hibernate for long in the great city. He said: "They actually can't think anything but New York. I was getting the same way."

I scareely felt myself the stereotyped newspaper interviewer as I chatted away with Mr. Harris. My task of "brain picking" was a pleasant one. I slid in by accident—I don't just know how. As the elevator lowered me to the street entrance I had the sensation of having had a friendly chat with an old-time friend.

IMP ENTERPRISE

The Great Charleston Hurricane and Flood Photographed—One of the Most Thrilling Pictures Ever Released

With commendable enterprise the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America rushed a photographer to the scene of devastation in Charleston, S. C., and obtained views of the havoc wrought by the storm during the closing days of August. Work has been rushed in the way of developing and the film is for release Monday, September 18. While the pictures were taken for the most part in the rain, the photography is perfect and the feat is pronounced by experienced picture men as nothing short of marvelous.

The film is about 700 feet in length and every inch is a graphic picture of woe, suffering and loss of life and property. Newspaper readers will call to mind descriptions of this, the most disastrous storm that ever occurred on the east shore of the Atlantic ocean. Charleston appeared to be in the very center of the storm zone and suffered to a greater extent than any other of the coast cities, receiving the full force of the two destructive elements—wind and water. The destruction brought about by these two powerful forces almost surpasses belief, but the camera is unerring and the proof is in the film.

The destruction by land and by sea is shown. The huge waves, dashing over the breakwater, sending the spray fifty feet high, make a gruesome foreground for the buildings adjacent warped and torn out of shape by the fury of the wind. Huge warehouses are razed to the ground and the debris scattered over acres. Dwellings are denuded of windows, with roofs lifted off as though by the hands of a mighty giant. Trains of heavily loaded cars are shown blown over, the cars split in twain and the contents strewn on the ground. Railroad tracks are shown that have been lifted and moved many feet, a tangled mass of track and ties. Vehicles are traversing the streets, hub deep in water, while pedestrians are moving about, wading in water to their waists, vainly trying to locate their property, with woe and desolation everywhere. On the water front the scene is appalling. Boats are washed ashore and landed high, but not dry on the docks, with masts by the board and seams gaping. Owners and crews of the craft are seen in the pelting rain, which fell incessantly for many hours, trying to bring order out of chaos and rescuing property from the mass of wreckage. Vessels foundered and went ashore during this storm, and the loss of life was great. The scene of destruction was not confined to the water front, where the wind and waves combined, for the devastation all over the city is apparent. Some idea of the severity of the hurricane can be gotten by the views of trees uprooted, those with huge trunks being blown down, lodged against buildings, and twisted with large limbs torn off and blown many feet. Traffic was suspended on many of the principal streets while a large force of workmen labored in the pelting rain to remove the wreckage. In many cases board sidewalks were lifted and swirled into the street, being piled up against other wreckage.

The most pathetic scenes are the rescue of sailors from the doomed craft. Many of the navigators clung for hours in the rigging of the ships while the waves beat upon the craft under them threatening every moment to swamp the vessels. Liners attempted to anchor but the fury of the hurricane was so fierce that chains were snapped and the boats drifted about helplessly at the will of the storm until succor arrived. Mariners say it was the worst storm they ever encountered. Acting on the warning from the weather bureau, hundreds of boats stayed at their docks, not caring to venture forth with the barometer falling.

On the whole the film is one of the most remarkable ever made, and the energy of the camera man acting under the explicit instructions from the Imp management in New York to secure a negative of the storm regardless of expense, is an illustration of the enterprise of the company to serve its patrons with views of events as they occur.

MOVING PICTURES AND NARROW-MINDED PREJUDICES

(Concluded)

By A. L. Barrett

There are thousands of people also who are utterly opposed to dancing, citing dance halls and places of questionable amusement as the certain and fitting end of all dancers. The most ancient records of any nations prove dancing to have been indulged in by all ranks, and it would seem to be one of our inherent instincts. There cannot be much vice in the thousands of little five-year-old children who throng the city streets, yet as soon as even a street organ or a band is heard, a group of youngsters can be seen exhibiting their infantile conception of the terpsichorean art. It is in the nature of young and growing people to dance, and this is emphasized very strongly in the Latin and Slavonic races, yet there are many persons who try in vain to totally repress this human instinct and declare it to be the invention of the devil. Does it seem reasonable that on account of their love of dancing the whole of the Latin races should be doomed to perpetual punishment? Surely entire races of people cannot be wrong. Besides these races, however, there are millions of other people who dance, yet the majority of them become respectable members of society, most of them having exceedingly strong religious convictions. If the non-dancers are asked to state their personal experiences in society where dancing is permitted and of the evil forces they have found there, in 99 cases out of 100, those persons will be very shocked at the mere suggestion of being seen in such company and declare vigorously that they cannot dance a step and have never been where it was tolerated in all their lives.

The moving picture industry has exactly the same ignorant prejudice to combat. As in other cases, the strongest denunciations against them are, and will be, by persons who are least qualified to judge and have never entered a moving picture theater. This was particularly emphasized at a recent meeting at which the question of picture plays was discussed. Nearly everyone present contributed their quota of vilifications and attributed to the pictures every possible variety of evil imaginable. Finally, one gentleman (a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, by the way), rose and said that he had listened carefully to what the others had said, and he was convinced that they were, to say the least, exaggerating the matter. He had been to many picture plays but had never seen such scenes portrayed as had been described, in almost every instance having seen pure, good stories, with a wholesome moral; and then, growing enthusiastic, he declared them to be the religious educator of the future, the best methods by which converts could be won, the best medium to encourage Bible study, the best aid possible to a Sunday school superintendent, and finally, the one medium which the clergy needed to impress religious truths on skeptical congregations found so often in the modern church, and would those gentlemen who had been to a moving picture theater within the last ten years, kindly rise. Everyone present, however, was deficient in kindness.

On further discussion it was found that they had never been to a picture play because they had heard such awful things about them, and the reports of their evil influence on young people and of how many they had led astray, was the foundation on which the assembled company had built their theories and fed their prejudices, but not one of those present had the slightest practical or personal information on the subject for the all-sufficing reason that they would not be seen in a place of such questionable amusement.

It is always difficult to remove a prejudice, but if, instead of arguing with such a person, the question was asked, "When were you last at a church, a theater, or moving picture show, when did you last read your Bible, can you dance," etc., it would be found that he had not done so for years at least, in many cases, never, but had formed his prejudices solely on account of some unfortunate or disgraceful episode connected with some particular church, or had had the misfortune to become acquainted with an unfrocked clergyman, had listened to the reports concerning the characters of some members of the theatrical profession who were a public and moral disgrace to it, could cite out of a very wide acquaintance extending through a lifetime, about a dozen cases where some weak-willed young people had been lured to destruction by means, primarily, of dancing, and in the case of the moving pictures, had probably never entered a theater, but had listened to reports circulated by persons who visited the worst types of ten years ago, or he had looked at the posters sometimes displayed. A good theorist can frequently convince people, but pinned by a merciless question that probes at once to the root of the contention, the sight of his confusion will usually furnish material for a very moving picture, if witnessed by a sympathetic audience.

Apropos of the present moment, ask any one of these wholesale, unthinking denunciators of the industry if there is anything specially detrimental to morals or religion in the most beautiful presentation of kinemacolor, the inventor of which has used as a fitting introduction of his wonderful discovery, the Coronation of George V of England.

It is very unfortunate that the very persons who possess no practical information on a subject, who, for instance, have never or rarely been inside a church or theater, would scarcely recognize a Bible if they saw one, cannot dance, and have only seen the outsides of a motion picture theater—are the very ones who are taken most seriously and believed in most implicitly by thousands who swallow their words of unwisdom with touching confidence and childlike simplicity which might have been allowable even so recently as 500 years ago, but which in this enlightened age seems little short of imbecility, for the simple reason that people do not think and investigate for themselves.

In the case of the moving pictures, if some of the non-frequenting, yet know-it-all public were to see some of the beautiful pictures from France, England, Italy, and other countries showing various industries, some of the dramatized literature now being presented, some of the religious plays, or could see the beautiful production of kinemacolor Coronation films, they would forget the picture plays they have seen only by means of a very lively imagination, and would be a little wiser—possibly in time attaining to the wisdom of those who frequent the much maligned moving pictures.

IN DEFENSE OF THE MOVING PICTURE SHOW

By Charles Delman

THE moving picture drama has seized upon the imagination and heart of the people from the United States to the antipodes; and has brought in its wake the upbraidings of the moralists and the scorn of the intellectual.

The moralist decries many of the pictures presented because he insists that they will deprave the young; the high-browed intellect bewails the barrenness of the intellectual element; fresh-air faddists have objections, on the score of the Nickelodian theaters being unventilated; and the hue and cry has been raised for a thousand other reasonable and unreasonable reasons. The public, it may be added, continues to go to the moving picture show anyway.

The publicity given to a number of cases of young lads who were caught in some petty criminal act, which they admitted was in imitation of what they had seen at a moving picture show gives those who are pointing out the demoralizing influencing of this class of amusements a leg to stand on. But because this is true in a tiny thimbleful of cases (not even a handful) does not prove it true generally. It would be difficult in this instance to prove a general truth from a particular one. And even in some of the instances, I believe it would develop, on investigation, that the conduct of the boy was in no wise prompted by criminal tendency, but was of the nature of the boyish prank; that love of adventure and excitement which the country lad gives vent to by raiding the farmer's orchard, and those other (to adults) stupid and destructive acts that are expressive of the boy. They are part of him, he is unconscious and not desirous of wrong-doing—he ceases to indulge in such pranks when a maturer conception of life make them unworthy of the dignity of his new manhood. It is not often that any one gives way to verbiage as to the corruption to the boys' morals which must result from mischievous pranks; we recognize them as being natural to his youthful, vigorously bounding blood—we phrase it that "boys will be boys." This is not in any sense an argument for the encouraging or permitting of conduct that endangers or disturbs others, but does recognize the fact that it is not criminality always, but rather mischievousness and adventuresomeness that prompt a youth to imitate what he saw at the moving picture show. Courts do not bring such facts to light; they only inquire as to the guilt or innocence of the parties concerned.

The fact, too, of more serious crimes among adults (suicide, and even murder), influenced, apparently, by something portrayed at one of these shows, seems further to strengthen the position of the party of opposition. But how, if a book, "The Sorrows of Werther," by Goethe, recently described by the New York Times Saturday Review as a melancholy romance, exercised an equally obnoxious influence? A young man, reports the Review, was found dead, with a copy of this novel beside him. When the novel first appeared, in 1774, we are also informed, "world weariness" was at its height and cases of suicide occurred throughout Germany as the result of reading it. Note, the writer states, that world weariness was at its height, and then attributes the suicide of the young man mentioned to the influence of the story. I think it can be ascribed only superficially to its influence. It was world weariness, from whatever deep-rooted and unknown cause, that really incited self-destruction; the novel was only a reflection of the young man's state of mind, and if that had not precipitated his act, something else most surely would. Healthy-minded and healthy-bodied persons are not readily prompted—in fact, not prompted at all—to crime by books or by moving picture shows, either; if they were, we would have more of it.

The American Review of Reviews, calling attention to this apparently vicious effect of the moving picture drama, mentions: "Only a few weeks ago the newspapers told of a tragedy in Philadelphia. A clerk, unreasonably jealous of his wife, went with her to a moving picture melodrama. It showed a home disrupted by a friend's attentions to the wife. The suggestion of the fancied wrong fanned the clerk to murderous rage. The next morning this clerk shot his wife dead in the presence of their seven-year-old son." That clerk might have witnessed "Othello," and the same direful result followed.

And so, now and again, other cases of crime are reported by the newspapers that seem directly traceable to the influence of a moving picture scene. But in any of them, nothing but shallow thinking could ascribe the crime or suicide to other than the victim's state of mind—or health. If this had not precipitated the act, something else surely would.

Here we have, side by side, as a motive force of crime (agreeing for the sake of argument that they were the inciting cause), a book by one of the world's geniuses and a moving picture melodrama. What are we going to do about it? Shall books and dramas and moving picture shows be suppressed because there are a few susceptible people in the country? But isn't it stupid to consider only a few isolated cases? What is the effect of these forces of our modern age upon the people in the aggregate? It is only by considering thus that we can arrive at any trustworthy conclusions. According to the magazine from which the abstract quoted was taken, in this country, two and a quarter million persons attend the moving picture show daily, in round numbers, a total of eight hundred and twenty-one millions yearly; that is a large proportion of our eighty million population attend the moving picture show often enough during the year to be thoroughly corrupted, if the alarmists are to be believed. But do we find this to be the case? Has crime increased since the advent of the moving picture show? Perhaps our political crooks and corrupt legislators learned their crooked business at the moving picture show? Crime flourished prior to its advent, prisons were as full, the citizenship was as poor, as bad influences surrounded the children and youths of this country. If it wasn't the moving picture show it was the dime novel, if it wasn't the dime novel, it was the boarding school, where the boys learned vicious habits. I wonder what it was that corrupted boys before these evil (?) influences appeared on the scene? We know that young people have always been corruptible—it has ever been necessary for parents to keep their eyes upon the children to save them from evil ways. It must be that the young folks are intrinsically bad(?). The writer has known many boys who read all the cheap, blood-and-thunder novels going, but they turned out ordinary, respectable, peaceable adults. Boys read dime novels, girls "Bertha Clay" love stories, adults attend moving picture shows, for the same reason that most people read the very best literature—the world's masterpieces—to be amused; to be taken out of themselves, away from the sordid facts of their everyday life. We all believe that to read literature for amusement is perfectly legitimate, nothing harmful or undesirable about it. And, in fact, much of our literature, including, by the way, the dramas of Shakespeare, were written to satisfy this craving of people to be amused, to be told stories. It is this very faculty of an editor in combining matter in a magazine that interests and amuses people, that secures for it a large circulation. We do not hear of magazines hiding the fact that they are interesting and amusing, do we? Perhaps some would like literature read for its elevating influences, etc., but, no; we may be ashamed of the fact, but we must frankly confess that we read it solely because it interests us, it amuses us—we enjoy it. We like a man if he can tell a good story, why not if he can picture it?

Moreover, there is no truth in the assertion that it is the younger element who are attracted by these shows. Certainly, any one, who has visited the moving picture show often enough to be more than an "arm chair critic," knows full well, that by far the greater number of the spectators were adults. Despite this fact, the opponents of this form of amusement continue to harp upon the evil effect that it has upon the young. Those who attend these shows do so not for the purpose of being uplifted, of being educated, but solely to be amused. The convenient proximity of the theaters, their extreme cheapness, put it within the means and time of all to attend. These are, of course, the chief reasons for their popularity.

What sort of picture drama is it that has excited the prejudices of the critics? What do most of the moving picture theaters offer their attendants? Chiefly, pictures that are based on love stories, on "wild and woolly West" adventures, Shakespeare's plays and well-known stories serve as themes, farce and comedy fill a good part of the daily or nightly "program"; drama of the tragedy, comedy, pastoral, historical, tragical-comical, historical-pastoral order, as Polonius phrased it, is portrayed. Stories, a thousand fold more horrifying than the worst that may be produced at the moving picture theater, are daily told in the newspapers, and life itself teaches nearly all lessons more vicious than can be taken from the moving picture drama, if it is supposed that the attendants of them ever do draw a moral from what they see. Amusement, relaxation are what they seek. Are not these perfectly natural and needful of fulfilment?

As an example of the attitude of many on this subject I quote the following. This writer, in a popular health magazine, after scornfully inveighing against the picture and cheap vaudeville show, applying such epithets as "empty-headedness" and "vaudevillemania" to the habit of frequenting them, and classing them among the noxious pastimes, such as smoking and drinking, in a concluding sentence, goes on to say: 'I indict these shows as mental drugs; they dope the mind, clog the intellect, pander to a false taste, opiumize the brain—besides injuring the eyes and the lungs, and depleting the contents of the purses of their victims." A serious indictment truly. If it effects all the evils claimed, then it is a greater menace to the mind, morals and health of the people than, for instance, either tobacco or alcohol, for the former habit is far more universal; men take their wives, youths their sweethearts, mothers their babes and children—both sexes and all ages come in contact with this monster, the moving picture show; whereas smoking and drinking is confined, on the whole, to men (and not all of them are subject to it).

But are these assertions true? Such strictures are generalizations which, made in the abstract, can be applied by any one to many other things on this earth besides moving picture shows. And if the good-sounding words impress you duly, and if you are not overparticular in requiring all the facts, you will believe them. Most of the antagonists of the moving picture show slash deeply, and to my mind blindly, at "empty-headed" amusements. O, anybody knows who has attended the vaudeville shows (the very best of them) that the jokes are often dull and stupid, that the wit and humor is not wit and humor, that the impersonations are disappointing. But they amuse and please the thousands who attend them. For a few hours each night they relieve of care and worry hundreds of men and women—lightening if not enlightening their hearts and minds. Are not such amusements, accelerating as they do the pleasureable emotions, of value in refreshing the mind and improving the health? And we all know of the health destroying effects of evil emotions, and the good effects of good emotions.

Well, the moving picture show offers the relief, the amusement, the relaxation which tired men and women seek after their day of toil. The moving picture show injures the eyes and lungs of the spectators? Well, what in this world doesn't? Is the ordinary man's work of a nature to improve his eyesight and strengthen his lungs, or to injure them? We know that too often it injures them. Are the newspapers and books he reads printed on proper paper and in type of a size and style that will safeguard his eyesight? Again, we know that too often they are not. But, because of all these factors that undermine his health, it may be said, he should spend every available moment recruiting it. But is not amusement and relaxation valuable for this purpose?

Another pleasant and easy manner of putting the seal of final condemnation over what we have made up our minds, without any real grounds for so doing, is an evil, is to declare that the particular object of our dislike dopes the mind and is a panderer to a false taste, and then dismiss the subject as entirely settled. And the moving picture show comes in for its share of attack in this fashion. But these things are still a matter of opinion. Such shows might dope the mind of one who expected to be edified by them, but not that of one who simply wanted to rest his mind, or be entertained. What is "one man's food is to another poison" applies as forcibly in matters of recreation. As for false taste, what is false and what is true? Men's tastes are so diverse and complex that it would be difficult to designate the one or the other. For instance: A hundred literary critics will express a hundred opinions of a work, as different from one another's as can be, some complimentary, some uncomplimentary, some wisely non-committal. If one attempted to guide himself by the tastes of the critics, where would he be?

Taking it all in all, the enemies of the moving picture show are prejudiced against it on the three grounds, that it is morally, mentally and physically a detrimental amusement—an amusement that is productive of diseased morals, intellects and eyes and lungs.

To those critics, who, disregarding the ethical standpoint, nevertheless seize upon the hygienic aspect, who mercilessly condemn the moving picture shows because the eyes may be taxed or the air be not so pure as it might or should be (though this latter is really the fault of the theater, and not the drama), it may be said that the identical objections advanced against the moving picture show could be made against the best drama, performed by the best actors in the best theater in the country. The watching of any play entails taxing the eyes; in no theater is the air pure. But surely the ordinary person is not so fragile as to fear that an evening at the theater, or even fairly frequent visits to one, will injure his health as pie would upset the stomach of a dyspeptic.

From these several standpoints, the critics set up straw dummies—call them evils inherent in the amusement they are condemning—and straightway proceed to knock them down at their pleasure.

To the people who are busy with the drudgery of factory, office and home, rather than with "living and learning," the moving picture show fills a read need in their lives. It takes them outside of themselves, gives them new experiences, quickens their emotions; for does it matter so much whether the depiction of human passions is effected by means of the book, the theater or by pictures focussed on a screen? They stir us just as greatly. The heart strings may be tugged quite as effectually by the silently moving screen people as by the words the printed page impresses on the mind. The moving picture show would, perhaps, have disgusted the cultured ancient Athenian who heard the greatest orators, who was delighted by the finest dramas, who viewed the most beautiful sculpture, and had nothing to do but attend to the business of the state; but it does please those of this country who are not so fortunate in the possession of such advantages.

On this question of moving picture shows, the little poem, "The Nickel Theater," by James Oppenheim, strikes the right chord. It sets before us vividly the reasons for the screen drama's enthrallment. The histrionic instinct is one that we all possess in more or less degree, and certainly the dramatic has ever been one of the highest and keenest forms of intellectual enjoyment and stimulation. As a matter of fact, in Europe especially, great actors and actresses have posed for the picture drama, and the production of many of these so-called "canned" dramas are really great artistic triumphs. There has really been no occasion for the riot of rhetoric in denunciation of the moving picture drama that was heard from all sides after it had become popular and common.

Here is our poem:

"O, Shakespeare, come and sit with us! Here are such theater-glories
As you, O, million-peopled Soul, had loved! For you told stories
The crowd could see—yea, though the poems swept over their brains blind,
So much were women and men your words you spoke to all mankind.

"It's a thick, black room and a rough rude crowd—the real strong human stuff—
A screen's before, a beam of light rules through the air—enough!
Lo, on that beam of light there darts vast hills and men and women,
The screen becomes a stage; here's life, blood-red with the living human!

. . . . . .

"Yea, in ten minutes we drink Life, quintessenced and compact,
Earth is our cup, we drain it dry; yea, in ten minutes act
The lives of alien people strange; the Earth grows small; we see
The humanness of all souls; all these are such as we!

"O, at day's end, and after toil that dragged the heart in the street,
What utter glory to forget, to feel again the beat
Of the warming heart with light and life and love's unearthly gleam,
Till Dreams become our Living World, and all the World's a Dream!

"Now we have lived the pain of others, now we have drunk their joy!
It gives us new heroic grip upon our day's employ!
O, Shakespeare, here Earth's dimmest brain can draw strength from great stories!
The millions grasp their heritage of Art, the theater-glories!"

After reading this, when we have been stirred to feel that the "nickel theater" is a most desirable institution on earth, it is only just to note that the critics who view it with aversion regard the o'erfrequent patronage of the moving picture show as degenerating. But, pray, is not too much book-reading bad? Perhaps there is a difference of opinion on these matters? Can one read Shakespeare too much? Some very eminent educators apparently think not. Is not too much exercise, too much bathing (to return to a prior consideration of hygiene), too much of a thousand and one things one might think of, harmful? One can surely weaken the body, therefore the mind, by an excess of bathing or an excess of exercise (both, otherwise, excellent and impera tively necessary habits. Just so, one can dope the mind by too much reading or by too frequent attendance at moving picture shows. Herbert Spencer once observed that if he had read as much as many people, he would know as little as they. That, of course, is questionable. Such arguments are rather against excess, and applicable to everything, than against the moving picture show specifically.

And now a few words to those who think one should be ashamed of attending moving picture shows because they are not "high class" amusements. The sting in the little excerpt from the speech of the statue in "Man and Superman" is particularly applicable: "At every one of these concerts . . you will find rows of weary people who are there not because they really like classical music, but because they think they ought to like it." Are there any critics of the moving picture show, who sneer at it because it appeals to the common people (there's the rub), among the weary sitters at the classics? And may we not in answer to such critics say, though the thought was debased in the mouth of Polonius:

"This, above all,
To thine own self be true,
And it follows as the night the day,
That thou canst not then be false to any man."

It has been frequently pointed out that the moving picture show can be made an effective educational force. Educators are recognizing this more and more. Perhaps in time, the cinematograph will be to the school what stereopticon views now are to the lecture room.

But to what good ends the moving picture can be turned has not been the concern of this article. The purpose of it has been to defend the much-maligned moving picture show as it now is—on its lighter side, a means of enjoyment to millions of people.

THE RED DEVILS

Champion Release, September 13th

It was our pleasure and privilege this week to be shown an advance proof of the above film, a dramatization of Sidney Drew's drama, "The Red Men." We congratulate Champion on their procuring the sole rights for filming this beautiful concept, and if we may say so, an admirable conceit. As we saw the pictures evolve before our vision we could express nothing but praise for the manner in which it has been handled. It is a story out of the ordinary and briefly told. As we have seen, it is as follows:

A circus visits a military center and the heroine in the form of the principal equestrienne of the circus falls in love with one of the officers of the regiment which is immediately reciprocated, in fact, a case of love at first sight. The officer is ordered with his regiment to the West and before going asks the girl in marriage. The father gives his consent. After the departure of the regiment the circus falls on hard times and the receipt of a telegram from the West offering to take care of the show brings joy to the heart of the proprietor. He immediately hastens West. On the way they come to a dangerous point of their journey, a place infested by Indians, who, in spite of the sheriff being on the stage coach, attack it. The girl sends a hasty letter to her lover, whose post is not far away from this point of attack, and a portion of the regiment hasten to the rescue. In the meantime the Red Devils, who are expert acrobats, hold the attention of the Indians pending the arrival of the rescuers. The stunts they do certainly keep the Indians guessing, and they are held in this hypnotic spell until the chief, scenting something wrong, gives the order to attack the Red Devils. At this instant Uncle Sam's boys come galloping along, put the Indians to flight, and the lovers are reunited, nevermore to be parted.

Is not this, as we said above, a pretty conceit, and we feel sure there is a great sale ahead of the Champion Company for this beautiful film. We may say, in addition to the above, that there is special sheet music written to accompany this film, and every exchange, we understand, will have the music furnished to them free. This is another step in the right direction, because the music played when a film is on the screen is, in our opinion, one of the most attractive aids to the proper exhibition of each scene.

A TRIBUTE TO OURSELVES

New York, August 28, 1911.

TO Mr. Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, all moving picture men in general and alien operators of moving picture machines in particular owe a special vote of thanks for his swift and brilliant services in securing the new amendment to the recent Higgins law in New York State.

With the adoption of the amendment alien operators may resume their interrupted duties in this state, thus reinstating many experienced men who were invaluable to many exhibitors.

Ordinary gratitude demands adequate recognition of the good done in this situation by Mr. Saunders and his paper. For this reason the author of this humble screed makes in advance a vigorous protest against blue pencilling any part of this text which relates to Mr. Saunders personally. Promptness and energy in meeting the big and little problems of any profession are not so abundant that they may be ignored. Mr. Saunders was prompt where others chose to delay; and he was energetic where even those more concerned than he were discouragingly slothful. It was due solely to the superior merit and quality of Mr. Saunders that the benefits described in this screed were secured for a suffering class of moving picture men.

The character of those benefits justifies a cursory review in these lines.

The consternation which was caused among the alien operators last October by the Higgins bill resulted in the actual calamity of it becoming law on January 1st of this year. Some provisions of the bill were beneficent enough, namely, the stipulation requiring a rigid technical examination in electrical and mechanical knowledge, also the ban upon operators under age. So there were features of the Higgins law which candor may not condemn. But the downright ruin of its one malignant clause aimed at the alien operator practically nullified the wiser passages. This clause of the law stipulated that a foreign born resident of the United States could not operate a moving picture machine without possessing official papers of naturalized citizenship.

The distress which followed the adoption of the law is still fresh in the minds of all. The alien clause was rigidly enforced and the license of all foreign born operators were revoked. Expert mechanics robbed by civilized law of their useful trades, turned to driving trucks, shoveling snow, etc., anything they could find. Some unable to obtain work of any sort were soon starving with their stricken families—added to this it is a known fact that many incompetent men were employed to operate machines after the bill became law, causing worry and expense to many exhibitors. The injury wrought by the alien clause awakened much protest, but for the greater part this protest consisted of words. They issued from operators' unions, boards of various kinds, secretaries of this and that, foreign consuls, associations, legislators, judges and the like—words all words. Nobody did anything, but all talked about doing everything. The distress of the poor alien remained unchanged and the business in general continued to miss the service of many tested men.

In this crisis Mr. Saunders took hold of matters. He was vigorous and effective. He did something. He did it with intelligence. He did not pass a few formal resolutions, make glib speeches and quit. He began to act. The upshot of his various moves was a proposed amendment to the Higgins bill. This amendment, it is said, emanated from no less a dignitary than the President of the United States. At least he corresponded with Governor Dix, who exerted his influence on the side of the foreign born operator, and the amendment, so framed as to restore alien operators to their due share of prosperity and progress, went before the proper legislative bodies. In fact, the terms of the amendment entirely abrogated the alien clause of the now celebrated Higgins law.

All this happened within a few days of Mr. Saunders' first moves and at this writing the adoption of the amendment is among the certain forecasts of excellent judges.

For all this alien operators owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Saunders, who has proved himself to be a man of first-grade judgment and capacity.

Signed by Four Union and Three Non-union Aliens.

HISTORICAL RECORDS BY CINEMATOGRAPHY

The Cinematograph is reeling off pictures by the thousand —pictures for our instruction and pictures for our entertainment. But what eventually becomes of them? To what ultimate purposes will they be put? Is there even, indeed, any systematic attempt being made to take those pictures which shall prove of the greatest value to the future historian and the future citizen—the historian and the citizen of five hundred years hence, who will endeavor to reconstruct human life of the nineteenth century from such documents as time and fire have not destroyed.

It is our pleasure to record the inception of such an attempt. There has been vague talk of it before. Some persons doubtless have even believed that something of the kind was being done. Yet the first endeavor towards such an undertaking was actually begun only a few weeks ago when Alexander Konta, of New York City, wrote a letter to the New York Evening Post in which he set forth his plan for a Modern Historic Records Association. The Moving Picture News was quick to recognize the importance of his suggestions, and a member of our staff called upon him and prepared a brief article on the subject which appeared in the issue of July 29th.

Big things move slowly, and nowadays enterprises divested of commercialism and free from all sensationalism must be especially slow in elaboration and development. Yet the idea underlying the Modern Historic Records Association has taken root at once. The great newspapers of New York, which are always hospitable to public projects of worth, immediately opened their columns to the enterprise. The Times in an editorial said:

"By means of the kinetoscope and the phonograph, had they been invented in his time, we might now see Bismarck, that intellectual and physical giant of abounding energy, and hear his thin, piping voice as he uttered the words that shaped the destinies of European governments. Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg would be delivered by himself before countless thousands of the children of to-day, and those yet unborn. Thus the majestic figures of prophets and poets may in future rise from the oblivion of printed documents into the visual and auditory world.

"But Mr. Konta's plan is more comprehensive than this. There has never been an association formed to systematize the gathering and preservation of contemporary records for posterity. The Times has shown how the most precious historical documents of this nation are housed in buildings at Washington subjected to the mercies of the casual cigarette and the flung-away sulphur match. Our newspapers are not capable of preservation through the centuries like the rolls of Egyptian papyrus; of them special and less perishable imprints should be preserved. The best photographs of the past generation may not be found in the original plates; Mr. Konta would gather the photographic plates, which should be preserved as records.

"We have methods of fireproofing such as have never been equalled. We have inventions that catch, retain and reproduce vividly the very lineaments and voices of our times. We can transfer our written records to imperishable fabrics. It is in the ripeness of time, as Mr. Konta says, that we may now provide 'a systematic extension of the historic records which the present may bequeath to posterity.'"

The other day a New York Tribune reporter obtained an interview from Mr. Konta on the subject, asking him how he came to conceive his idea. "Well," said Mr. Konta, "it was in the air. The ready response I received from all sides the moment I proposed it proves that. It was bound to come. As a matter of fact, however, I first thought of it several years ago. Brugsch Pacha was taking me over the museum of Egyptian antiquities at Boolak, and regretting the scantiness of our knowledge of the remote past of the country and its people, owing to the lack of records.

"The thought came to me then: 'What is this advanced civilization of ours doing for the enlightenment of the historians of the far distant future? Do we think of them? Do we prepare records for them much more than did these Egyptians at the dawn of civilization?' And I came to the conclusion that we do not. They at least wrote on stone to a far greater degree than we do, who trust the accounts of our current history to the most perishable of mediums of preservation—paper. At the end of a historic period our scientific historians rewrite its current accounts, and place its definitive history—on paper. Paper, paper everywhere. How long do you think that the hundreds of thousands of valuable books—books of the utmost importance to the distant future—will last?"

Here the interviewer suggested that what was worth while in these books would be preserved by being incorporated in later works.

"You assume," answered Mr. Konta readily, "that our civilization will continue to develop without a break, but there is a theory borne out by the past, that civilizations reach a certain point, then decline, and even disappear, leaving the human race to start anew at the bottom. Egypt was the beginning of our present civilization.

"What do we know of her early history? Greece was a later step in its evolution, and what do we really know of Greece? We have her art—a little of it—and her philosophers, some of her literature and a little of her drama. How much we do not know you can learn from Schliemann. Are you familiar with the perplexities of scholars concerning the pronunciation of classical Greek? What would they not give to know the way in which the choruses were spoken or chanted in Greek theaters? What do we know of ancient Greek music? Nothing at all.

"I could go on giving you examples of what is lost to our historical knowledge through the lack of enduring records in the past. Look at the Middle Ages. Pen and parchment, confusion, chronicles that are conflicting and incomplete, documents that have disappeared or perished or are undecipherable. And since the invention of printing we have just trusted to that—to paper. We have done so to this day. To-morrow it will be dust."

"But, after all, the written word will always be the chief source of information for historians," suggested the interviewer.

"Undoubtedly," said Mr. Konta, "but why not make it imperishable by photographing the written word after it has been printed in books and newspapers and preserve the plate in a fireproof vault? Why not do the same thing with documents of state? It is the same with the portraits of the great men of the past. Look at the contradictions, the uncertainties. How little we know of how they looked!"

"But is that not rather a trifling matter?"

"There are no trifles in the past for the modern historian. Turn to Frédéric Mason's books on Napoleon I. Ask the psychologists of the school of Lombroso, with their incessant probing of the possible relation between genius and insanity. Moreover, history is no longer past politics, or past wars, or past leaders. It is a matter of all that the old-time historians neglected, of the daily life of the common people, of their economic arrangements and social ways, of the pioneer, the settler, the trader on the frontier. These are records that we purpose to preserve for posterity as well as the documentary evidence of so-called 'great' events. And, mind you, these records will be most needed, and be most serviceable, if our present civilization continues to develop without breaks or interruptions. We cannot make too many records of the present to leave to posterity, and we cannot make them too durable.

"Why not enlist the services of the phonograph and the moving picture machine, of all the reproductive mechanical inventions of the present era? I do not know whether there is in existence a moving picture of the very first human flight. There ought to be. I spoke in my original letter of the historic value of a moving picture of Lincoln at Gettysburg, and of a phonographic record of his delivery of his immortal speech. Would you not like to see him and listen to him on the Fourth of July? Would you not like to be able to bequeath these records to your children's children? Would that not be far more impressive than the printed speech alone? And would not the speech be doubly guarded against being lost?

"Take a more modern instance. You can see to-day moving pictures of the coronation of King George, but one of the most momentous speeches of the hour, that of Mr. Lloyd-George on the Moroccan question, will be recorded on paper alone. How momentous it will prove to history in the making we do not yet know. The present generation even, not to speak of posterity, may yet regret that no phonographic record was taken of it and no cinematograph record of the speaker while delivering it.

"That sounds strange? Well, it will not sound so very long. This is a most serious undertaking, and its seriousness will soon be generally understood. The time is coming when the phonographic reporter and perhaps the cinematograph reporter as well will take their places beside the stenographers in the parliaments of men."

All this, of course, is very encouraging, yet newspaper support and publicity are not enough. It was essential to find men of distinction in professional and other walks of life who would co-operate with the founder in lending authority to his plan. Responses to such invitations to co-operate with him came readily. When the association is incorporated, as it will be within the next few weeks, its list of incorporators will include: Melville E. Stone, general manager of the Associated Press; Justice Victor J. Dowling, of the New York Supreme Court; Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of the New York Evening Post; A. B. Hepburn, president of the New York Chamber of Commerce; Dr. Talcott Williams, editor of the Philadelphia Press; John G. Agar, president of the National Arts Club; Dr. Melvil Dewey, librarian; General Thomas H. Hubbard, Robert C. Ogden, Dr. George F. Kunz and Edward Hagaman Hall, respectively president and secretary of the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society; George A. Plimpton, of Ginn & Co., publishers; Dr. Smith Ely Jelliffe, neurologist; George S. Johns, editor of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch; Paul Cravath, Joseph Rowan, Hamilton Holt, managing editor of "The Independent"; John De Witt Warner, Herbert L. Bridgman, William T. Evans, E. M. Cravath, J. N. Larned, Dr. Arpad G. Gerster, A. S. Van Westrum, W. T. Larned, Alfred H. Saunders.

The meetings of the association are to be held at the National Arts Club. The project, it is believed, is one that will not be limited in its appeal to scientific and public men. It should interest every one who is interested in the camera, the moving picture and the phonograph and who would like to see these miracles of modern invention put to their most valuable purpose. Future generations will profit most by the plan, yet it will also be practicable to reproduce some of these records a few years hence for the education and entertainment of everybody.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

Moralists, Hypocrites and the Picture Theater

By L. W. D.

A certain popular weekly journal "with a large circulation" on "the other side" recently published a lengthy article upon the potentialities of the picture theater, and the films exhibited therein. This, however, is not all. The "morals" of the "questionable" picture theater, and the people who attend them, come in for no small amount of criticism. The journal in question has attempted to portray in a lurid light the dreadful things that happen in these places. Its statements, suggestions, innuendoes are baseless, a wicked libel on the management of picture theaters. It referred also to the alleged brutality and immorality of many films. As a champion for our cause, the writer scarcely knows how to reply to the naive and futile statements. However, when the article was published I determined the industry should not take these insults "lying down," and although it involved me in considerable trouble, I replied through the daily press as follows: "Directly any new invention comes along, some more or less well-meaning persons suddenly discover that the novelty is fraught with perils of various kinds, against which it is necessary to be on one's guard. Sometimes these perils are moral, at other times they are physical or connected with hygiene. The man or woman who desires to get the best out of life, and knows that troubles will come without seeking them, usually pays little or no attention to these notes of warning; but it is an unquestionable fact that they render the lives of quite a large number of persons extremely miserable. Whether we eat, drink, or whatever we do, certain perils are concealed in our diet or taint our amusements, unsuspected, perhaps, but nevertheless menacing. Persons who pay over much attention to these perennial warnings come to regard everything as suspect, and have in consequence their lives rendered extremely miserable. The picture theater has not escaped the attention of the "faddists" and the fussy individuals who discover or imagine evils, whether moral or physical, in everything. As my readers are well aware (and as The News has pointed out countless times), the picture theater has ever since its inception been denounced by those ultra nice persons who dub themselves "moralists," and cannot divest themselves of the idea that, given the opportunities, people will, with one accord, take advantage of them, and behave in an extremely nasty manner. As for the damage supposed to be done to the brains of children owing to their imaginations being unduly excited by the pictures they may see in the picture theater, I regard this assertion as the merest fudge. The more young people—especially young people of the poorer classes—are taught to exercise their imaginative faculties, the better. The realities a large proportion of these children have daily to face and see are deplorable, and if they can be taken out of these realities for an hour or so, and wafted into the realm of fancy, all I can say is that the change is a most excellent one. We are not told in what manner the brains of these young people, who, for the nonce get out of their dull, sordid lives, are injuriously affected by the transformation. This is one of the imaginary "perils of the picture theater," a subject for ridicule in my opinion, and not one for serious consideration."

As incidents pertaining to the fortunes of children are always pleasing, the Imp Company has filmed several stories of the sort which will prove to be entertaining. "By Registered Mail" will be for release September 21, and the story will appeal especially to parents. There is pathos, parental love and devotion for the theme with a clever little girl in the principal role. She is the child of a poor mechanic and the father and mother love her dearly. There is an aunt who is possessed with a generous amount of riches but is childless. She offers to adopt the little girl and give her all the advantages that money will bring. The parents consider the offer seriously and prayerfully. They weigh the matter and finally decide that it will be for the best. They take leave of the girl and she goes to enjoy the comforts of a luxurious home. The parents are saddened. The father sees the children of his fellow workmen come to meet them on their way home from the shops. His grief is almost unbearable. The mother, too, is grief stricken, but they do not talk about their sorrow. It is too sacred. In the meantime the girl pines for home—for the love of her parents. The elegant surroundings do not satisfy, the toys fail to attract her mind from the longing that is in her heart. She resolves to return home, but how? She finally hits upon a scheme in revolving the matter in her mind. She remembers the kind mail carrier who delivered mail at her home and she resolves to trust herself to the mails. Securing a stamp, she places it on her breast and goes to the post-office. The novel scheme interests the men in the mail department and she is eventually delivered to her parents by the man in the uniform, to the great joy of her parents.

SELECTING THE PROGRAMME

Managers would do well to study the attitude of their audiences as a guide to assist them in selecting programmes. It would be a good thing if they would sit among their audiences occasionally just to see what they do and hear what they say. This would give them a line upon what pleases and what does not.

Just at present there seems to be a desire for pictures with Indians and cowboys, most of which are largely figments of the imagination. Few real Indians and few real cowboys acted as some of them do in the pictures, but they are about what the average person thinks they should be, hence are satisfactory.

This holds good in small towns and cities particularly. There the cowboy and Indian is quite as popular as when they first appeared. Indeed, some idea of the vogue of these types may be gained by realizing that practically every one of the most important companies are producing Western pictures. Evidently there is a call for them or they would not make thme. And unquestionably this call comes from outside New York.

One good drama is sufficient. A cowbow picture in the smaller paces, good comedy and one educational film would compose an ideal programme. If you have an illustrated song it ought to be one of those which everybody is whistling or singing. The audience will listen to it then.

Such a programme as this will please indefinitely. Good comedies are not plentiful, but a slapstick comedy will do in the absence of any other, though most audiences have rather tired of too many of them. Occasionally, however, the slapstick, with its smashed household furniture or its overturned workmen outdoors will bring applause when nothing else would. Apparently there is still a lingering desire to see people overset and things smashed, else there would be no applause.

A drama is mentioned here, but perhaps any other heavy film would do quite as well. The object is to regulate the programme so that it will appeal with special force to all classes. That is what brings them back again. The appeal to this or that particular class will make you permanent patrons. It is easy enough to accomplish this and with a little care it can be done.

Too much study cannot be given the programme, and it can be best studied from among the audience. There is where the comments are made that testify to the attractiveness of the pictures on the screen. There is where they all get together in a criticism that may be beneficial or otherwise. It is for managers to learn what is wanted and then act accordingly.

A LESSON IN ECONOMY

He was at the Coronation
With a lot of ostentation—
He saw the Royal pageant from a most expensive seat.
He was fulsome in his praises
Of the military mazes,
Asserting that such splendors we at home could never beat.

He described the grand processions,
And the many ornate sessions,
The lavishness of riches and the marvelous expense.
And he rather proudly boasted
Of the fact that he was "roasted"
At the British celebration among royalty intense.

And he filled us with his stories
About coronation glories—
The grandeur of the trappings, of the fireworks and the fun,
And accentuated mostly
On the point that it was costly,
And bragged about the pile he spent to see the crowning done.

Tho' it cost a thousand dollars
He is not the kind that "hollers"
At handing out the "dust" to figure in such big events,
But it got him moralizing
When he found them advertising
The whole thing in the picture shows for only fifty cents!

—JOHN S. GREY.

MR. A. M. KENNEDY

Mr. A. M. Kennedy, the general manager of the American Film Manufacturing Company, left Chicago, Saturday, September 2, for California.

His trip is one of general supervision and inspection of the Western Stock Company of the American Film Manufacturing Company, now situated in La Mesa, El Cajon Valley, Southern California.

The completion of a $10,000 studio and negative developing plant in La Mesa by the American Company is another reason for Mr. Kennedy's trip. it being considered advisable that the plant be thoroughly inspected prior to actual pictures being taken therein. It is asserted that this plant and studio is one of the best equipped structures of its kind in the world.

It is Mr. Kennedy's intention to visit the trade on the Coast prior to his return.

ABOUT SHAMROCK FILMS

The factory and studio of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, manufacturers of Shamrock film, is a scene of great activity just now, the entire staff are putting forth every effort and straining every faculty, with a view to equaling, if not surpassing, the excellent impression created by their confreres in the Independent ranks.

Outdoor work is occupying the attention of their carefully selected stock company, and several stories, tense in theme and consistent in construction, are, it is said, in course of preparation under able producers.

Everything is moving along with the precision and accuracy of a high-grade watch.

The recently installed machines and various improved methods introduced into the mechanical department, are working admirably, and the consequent results are most gratifying.

All concerned are working like beavers, conscious of the degree of artistic excellence already attained by their business competitors of the Independents. Everything indicates that they fully realize the importance of being ultra earnest in their efforts to make the first release of the Shamrock Company a notable one.

Familiar names will be recognized among those engaged in every department.

Mr. G. P. Hamilton, the manager of the production, is at the helm, and his name should be a guarantee that Shamrock film will give all that is promised and more, for his efforts in the past with the Essanay, American, and various other companies now to the front, have proven beyond question that he possesses a knowledge of the film industry worthy of all honor and respect.

Mr. Hamilton's ability as an organizer is known far and wide. He is always keen and alert, skilled in the estimate of men and seldom makes an error.

Mr. Horace Vinton, an actor of long and varied experience, and a writer not unknown in the world of scribes, has been selected for the production department, in which he holds the unique position of scenario editor and dramatic producer.

Mr. Vinton is not a stranger in the world of motion pictures, having been a contributor of scenarios to the various companies for the past five years. His first work as a producer being with Mr. Hamilton for three years, during which period he wrote and produced many of their most successful films.

Mr. Herman Schlicker is in charge of the technical and mechanical department. Mr. Schlicker was nurtured in the severe technical schools of Germany and Continental Europe, pursuing his scientific and mechanical studies in "Die Technical Gewerbe Schule" in Berlin, and "Die Technicum," Ilmenau, graduating with high honors. He afterwards served with distinction with the "Deutche Bioscope" and "Vitascope" in Berlin.

The stock company is composed of representative players recruited from the best known studios, all of whom have a following among the patrons of cinematograph theaters.

Miss Dot Farley, the leading woman of the Shamrock Company, has been identified with the theater since infancy. She began her career in the pictures with the Essanay Company. Recently she joined the ranks of the Shamrock Company. Miss Farley is considered the most versatile woman in the cinematograph world of to-day, and will be ably assisted by Mr. Randolph Gray, Mr. E. B. Bonner, Mr. Jackson D. Carlisle, Mr. Rodney Campbell, Miss Benita Villarreal, Miss Lucelia Potter, Miss Dorothea Gray, and others.

In the camera department, Mr. Alois Heimerl is prominent. Mr. Heimerl recently came from California, where his skill was largely responsible for most artistic and important effects photographically.

Mr. Uramus Hord, late head of the photographic department of the Pettibone Company, of Cincinnati, O., has charge of the developing, and is qualified in every way for the duties assigned him.

Mr. O. E. Goebel, the president and executive head, representing the stockholders, has spared no expense in preparing the studio and factory for the work which it is hoped will place them in the front rank, and promises, at no distant day, Shamrock film will shed its brilliant color in the field of motion pictures for some time to come.

Chillicothe, Ohio.—The Apollo moving picture theater has been sold by Mrs. Henry Hamm to C. A. Smith, of Marietta.

Ensley, Ala.—Franklin Theater Company, capital $3,000. John M. Martin, president.

Key West, Fla.—John Carbonell is having plans prepared for a new theater to cost $12,000.

CINEMATOGRAPHIC INDUSTRY ABROAD

American Consulate Reports

This issue we give considerable space to the industry abroad, and publish herewith reports from the American consuls. We have been at considerable trouble to get this information, but believe it will be of considerable interest to our readers, especially the manufacturing element, who may be desirous of opening up the foreign market.

American Diplomatic Agency and Consulate-General.
Cairo, Egypt, June 17, 1911.

Editor, Moving Picture News,

New York, U. S. A.

Gentlemen:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 8, 1911, asking for the imports of films into Egypt, and the country of their origin, for the past year or some definite period, giving the comparative figures for the like period in some previous year.

I regret the delay in replying which has been unavoidable. The customs authorities have been unable to give me any information on the subject, as cinematograph films do not figure as a separate article in the customs reports; being included under the general heading of "Photographic apparatus and accessories."

There are three or four halls and theaters in Cairo where cinematograph exhibitions are given daily with great success. They are extremely popular with both Europeans and natives.

The films most in use are those of Pathe Freres (French), but Italian films are frequently seen and, at the Salle Printania, films of the American Kinematograph Company (A. K.) are often shown.

I am, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,
Edward Bell,
Vice Consul-General.

Subject: Import of Photographic Films Into India.

Editor, Moving Picture News,
The Cinematograph Publishing Co.,
30 W. 13th Street, New York City, U. S. A.

Dear Sir:

In reply to your letter of the 8th ultimo in regard to the import of photographic films into India, I have to say that I applied to the Director General of Commercial Intelligence for information on this subject, and the answer returned to me was as follows:

"In reply to your letter of April 4, 1911, I beg to say that the imports of photographic films are not recorded separately, the statistics being merged in the comprehensive head, 'Photographic instruments, appliances, etc.' I regret the information is therefor enot available."

The value of photographic instruments, including photographic supplies, such as films, last year was $274,000. This is very indefinite so far as films are concerned, yet, it is the very best I can do in the way of an answer to your question. I enclose you a list of dealers in photographic material, including cameras, with whom you might correspond direct.

Respectfully yours, W. H. Michal,
Consul-General.

New York City.

Gentlemen:

I regret that I am unable to furnish the information called for in your letter of the 7th ult, the commercial statistics compiled here not specifying separately the amount of imports of films.

It is possible to say, however, that the imports have been constantly increasing from year to year. It is particularly notable that the use of American-made films is becoming much more common than before. Almost all of the moving picture places now exhibit some American films, while only a year ago there were but a few places which made regular use of them.

The business is run here on a much higher plane than in most countries. The charges are equivalent to about 16 cents and 32 cents, per admission, there being first and second class. Consequently the places are commonly quite luxurious and only good, new films are used. The very best families go in mass to spend evenings at these shows and as a rule the profits are large. An American, Mr. E. E. Claytor (Caixa Postal 718) is engaged in the business here, and you may be interested in communicating with him.

I am, gentlemen, Your obedient servant,
Julius G. Lay,
Consul-General.

Dear Sir:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 8, 1911, and in reply thereto have to state that the import of phonographs and supplies into this city for 1910 were valued at only $65.50, nothing being said about films, and so I fear that you will be again disappointed. It is possible that the imports at Yokohama or Kobe may show the import of films under that designation.

Respectfully yours, Carl F. Deichman,

London, E. C., March 29th, 1911.

The Cinematograph Publishing Company,
30 West 13th Street, New York City, U. S. A.

Gentlemen:

Replying to your letter of the 4th inst., I regret to say that no official returns are available, showing the imports of cinematograph films into the United Kingdom. I am reliably informed, however, that from January 1st, 1911, separate statistics will be preserved, giving the values, and the countries of origin, of the imports of films.

Those conversant with the business of picture shows state that the large majority of cinematograph films is imported from the United States, the amount varying from 60 to 75 per cent. The other countries, in order of importance, are: Italy, France and Sweden.

Cinematograph theaters have proved so popular in Great Britain, and so remunerative, especially to the pioneers, that it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that every town, of any size, has now one or more of these "picture palaces." Indeed, in the suburbs of London, where the population is congested, there are often from three to five of these theaters in the same street. The customary programme consists of from six to eight pictures, nad the charges for admission range from six cents to fifty cents.

Again expressing my regret because of my inability to give you segregated figure, and assuring you of my further service, as it may be required, I am,

Yours faithfully, John L. Griffiths,
Consul-General.

Consulate of the United States of America
Berne, Switzerland, Munzgraben 4,
April 25th, 1911.

The Cinematograph Publishing Company,
30 West 13th Street, New York City.

Gentlemen:

In reply to your inquiry relative to cinematograph films in Switzerland, I beg to refer you to the report from this office published in the Consular Reports for October, 1908, and in addition thereto to give you the following information:

There are no separate statistics of the importation of films for "moving pictures" into Switzerland. These goods are included in the general imports of photographic films, plates, positives and negatives.

Without doubt, the greater number of films used at the present time come from France; some from Italy, Denmark, and England. The "Pathe" films appear to be largely used, and among others noted are the "Pharos," "Roberts," and a few others, seldom shown.

Police regulations differ with the different Cantons, which are supreme in such matters. A cantonal law is projected for Berne, where, at present, the city police administration exercises supervision. Building regulations are very strict. Immoral and vicious pictures must not be shown. Some theaters, however, show pictures of doubtful value, such as "The White Slave," and other similar views, but children are not admitted to such performances. Of late industrial views, scientific and "microscope" pictures have found favor. Long, elaborate subjects of historical interest are frequently used, such as "The Fall of Troy," "Joan of Arc," etc., etc.

The customs duty on films is Frs. 30 per 100 kilograms ($5.79 per 220.46 pounds, gross weight, including packing).

Yours very truly,
Gen. Heimrod,
Consul.

Gentlemen:

In reply to the questions contained in your letter of the 8th ultimo, I have to inform you that films to the value of 15.000 (drachma—$0.193) were imported into Greece during the year 1910 and also during the year 1909. The films are mostly American films. Formerly they were imported via France, but now they are imported via England and Austria.

The cinematograph business in Greece is controlled entirely by the Pathé Company, of France.

No. 301

American Consular Service,
Cape Town, South Africa, April 19, 1911.

Cinematograph Publishing Company,
30 W. 13th Street,
New York City.

Dear Sirs:

I have received your letter of March 8 last requesting statistics of imports into this country of moving picture films. In reply, a representative of this Consulate-General made inquiries from the Customs Statistical Bureau and learned that there are no records of the number or value of moving picture films imported into the Union of South Africa. It was stated that films are principally imported through the post and all goods imported in that manner are lumped together without distinction as to their nature.

It is a well-known fact that American films are becoming more and more used in South Africa and their popularity is assisting the proprietors of moving picture shows to command very large crowds. The Indian scenes and pioneer life in America are especially popular here.

The shows which are being given in Cape Town have placed the entrance fee at 6d. (12 cents). Some are giving two shows in the evening and one in the afternoon; others only give one show in the evening lasting two hours. All are extremely well patronized and it is thought that Cape Town, although not a very large city, with already six moving picture shows, could support even more.

Faithfully yours, Richard Guenther.
American Consul-General.

Gentlemen:

With reference to your letter of March 8, 1911, concerning figures for imports of films and similar goods into China, I have to report that no account of such imports is kept by the Chinese Customs and there is no way of measuring such imports. I am inclosing you a brief memorandum on the cinematograph situation here which may be of some use to you.

Trust that I can serve you further, I am, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant, George E. Anderson,
Consul-General.

For the Cinematograph Publishing Company, New York.

Film Pictures in the East

The Imperial Maritime Customs returns for China do not specify the imports of films for moving pictures into China and Hongkong has no customs returns whatever, the result being that it is impossible to give any figures whatever as to the use of films in moving picture establishments either in Hongkong or in China. However, it may be said that there is a good and a growing business in all such lines of goods both in this district and in Chinese ports as well. In Hongkong there are half a dozen large cinematograph establishments and there is a large and growing business in private entertainment outfits. These entertainments generally are commencing to appeal to the Chinese, and owing to their comparatively low price of admission they are within the reach of a great population. There are indications that the immediate future may offer a great opportunity in the interior ports of China in this line, but to establish such means of entertainment in Chinese cities generally would require a campaign of education and considerable capital.

The cinematograph business in Hongkong and the lower China coast is largely in the hands of Portuguese—former residents of Macao—who also have practically complete control of the skating rink business and nearly all similar enterprises. They lean to French films as a matter of preference, though English films are common because of the fact that this is a British community and must have some British scenes. Some American films are used, but they are obtained mostly through European exchanges. The sale of the European goods rather than American seems to have been altogether a matter of convenience and due largely to the fact that few American film houses have reached after the business in this portion of the world.

Gentlemen:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of recent date and regret to inform you that, after some time, I have just received a reply from the statistical bureau of the Mexican Government to my request for information, in which it is stated that it has been found impossible to furnish figures showing the importation of moving picture films into this country for the reason that such importations are not kept separate, but are included in the importations of other similar articles. I regret the impossibility of giving you the information you desire.

Roughly approximating, however, I should say that only about 10 per cent. of the films imported into this country come from the United States, the balance being sent from France and Italy. Very truly yours,

Arnold Shanklin,
Consul-General.

American Consular Service, Constantinople, Turkey.

Messrs. The Cinematograph Publishing Company,
30 West 13th Street, New York City.

Gentlemen:

Regarding your recent request for information concerning the film business in Turkey, I take pleasure in giving you the following particulars.

Within the last two years quite a number of theaters giving exclusive moving picture performances have sprung up in Constantinople as well as in the seaport cities of the Empire. There are now about ten such places in Constantinople. The price of entrance varies from three piasters (13 cents) in the gallery to ten piasters (44 cents) in the orchestra. I enclose programme of current attractions. The films are generally changed every three days.

There being such a scarcity of theaters in Turkey, the inability and expense of procuring available and half-decent plays and actors, and the varied linguistic classes of people that have to be catered to, assure the moving picture business an era of great prosperity.

The majority of films are imported from France. The next largest number come from Italy. America and England come next in importance and a few films are imported from Germany.

There is one company, Union des Editeurs Cinematographiques, E. Schoenfeld, Adalet Han, Constantinople, that imports most of the films and loans them to the various theaters in the empire. The Pathe Freres of France have also a local representative here. The approximate total amount of films imported by the former company for the current year is $60,000 and by the Pathe Company $10,000. To this must be added the various films that are imported direct from the makers by the large theaters, the definite amount being impossible to ascertain. Generally speaking, $75,000 would cover the total imports of films in Turkey. Very few of the films are sold outright, in some cases when the film becomes shopworn it is sold to local dealers for ten centimes per meter.

Owing to the cholera scare and various other causes, the theater business suffered considerably during the past year; for that reason there has been no perceptible increase in the amount of imports for the year previous.

Placing my future services at your disposal,
I am, Gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,
G. Bie Raundal,
Consul General.

CHARLESTON SWEPT BY STORM

HEAVY DAMAGE WROUGHT HERE BY HURRICANE

Seashore Residents Undergo Some Terrible Experiences But No Lives are Lost

Many Have to Trudge Through the Water in Going to Places of Greater Safety

That no lives were lost on Sullivan's Island during the hurricane and deluge of Sunday night, appear more and more of a miracle as fuller reports of the darkness and suffering of the Atlantic-fille residents, particularly are brought to the city. With hundreds of people, among them many women and children, obliged to leave their wrecked and falling houses and venture out into the ninety-mile an hour gale, plunging through waist-deep water in many places, seeking refuge in the more substantial houses that none lost their footing and were drowned in the racing flood that covered the island seems miraculous.

When day broke over the island Monday morning, a scene of destruction certain was disclosed such as those who viewed it, never wish to see again. Parties of men who had looked after the safety of their own families, were out as soon as there was light enough, searching among the ruined houses, and their fearful that persons might have been caught under their overturned cottages and killed or injured, and when a thorough search showed that everyone had either reached a refugee in safety or weathered the storm in their own homes, great relief was felt.

As soon as it was fully daylight, a pitiful procession of homeless families started for the army post, where the refugees were made as comfortable as possible under the circumstances, by the officers and hospital corps. Scantily clad men carrying children and huge bundles of household belongings, followed by weary and exhausted women, trooped down the roads, through inches of water and struggling with the still violent wind.

TWO ARE KILLED AND THREE HURT

Tragedy at Ticket Office at Mount Pleasant During the Hurricane.

After lying all night at the Mt. Pleasant dock, the ferry boat Lawrence made her way across the harbor this afternoon at 1:30 o'clock, bringing about 400 people from Mt Pleasant. Most of the passengers spent the night on board the Lawrence. Reports from the little city across the bay indicate that the hurricane was just as severe there as in Charleston. The trestle adjoining the wharf was blown down and about 11 last evening when the elements raged at their worst the ticket office blew over, instantly killing Mr. Smith, of Columbia, and Mr. Truman Cutter, of Charleston, severely injuring Mr. L. D. Flintworthy, of St. Stephens, and Mr. E. T. Hill. The injured were rushed to the hospital upon the arrival of the Lawrence.

Passengers aboard the Lawrence were unanimous in their praise of young Alfred Von Kolnitz, who, with a rope around his waist, carried a line out to the boat. The details of the heroic act were conflicting, but everyone gave Mr. Von Kolnitz the title of "hero."

An account of the tragedy at the Mount Pleasant wharf comes from an eye witness, Mr. William L. Perry, of Columbia, a friend of Mr. Smith. The two gentlemen, accompanied by Mrs. Smith and her niece, Miss Annie McDougal, arrived in Charleston yesterday morning at 9:30 and proceeded to the Isle of Palms. After enjoying the surf, the party heeded the warnings of the consolidated officials and took the cars for Mount Pleasant. On arriving at the Mount Pleasant wharf at about 7:30, where it was found that the heavy sea and gale would not permit the trip and a large crowd of passengers left the steamer and took the waiting cars for the most promising place of safety, the car barn on Mount Pleasant. One train returned to the wharf to take the passengers back to the barn, but before it had proceeded any distance the current was off and the passengers walked to the shelter in safety.

About one hundred persons on the Lawrence neared the bridge to the wharf from the mainland give way with a crash, and then it was realized that the boat was the only shelter that could be had in the raging tempest. Accompanied by his wife, her niece, Miss McDougal, Mr. Perry, a Mr. Clear, and another Columbian, whose name is not known, Mr. Smith had succeeded in making the mainland before the bridge gave way. and scarcely a home was not damaged, either by the wind or water.

All the smaller buildings, servants' quarters and fences were uprooted by the wind, and in some cases carried a couple of stations down the island by the sweeping tide. Roofs of wrecked houses, telegraph poles, fences, detached piazzas, and all manner of wreckage was scattered all over the island, and in the roads.

On Monday morning, the beach was swept as clean as a floor. No vestige of the sand dunes remained, and the surface was level from the edge of the still high water to the first row of houses. The telephone and light poles on the beach were all snapped off even with the sand, and had been carried up to the houses.

HOUSES BLOWN FROM BEACH

The front row of houses, at station 23, which are built nearer to the water than any others on the island had fortunately been abandoned when the water first began to rise on Sunday night, and several of them were swept clear of their foundations and blown against the houses behind them. Nearly all of the front row from that point to the end of the island were left by their owners, who sought refuge in the cottages further from the water, and the more substantial houses were filled with people who had made their way to them from their own threatened dwellings.

In one of these havens, which was turned over to the sheltering of refugees, over twenty people were gathered, and spent the night in momentary expectation of the tide rising high enough to carry away the house. Many such parties were gathered at different places, and none of the people who spent the night in such conditions will ever forget the experience.

It was in getting the people from endangered houses to the stronger and farther removed ones, that the greatest danger was encountered, and many of those engaged in the work proved themselves worthy of the name of hero.

While many deeds of daring and brave endurance were accomplished during the wild night, one case in particular has come to light. At station 25, the water came up with a rush, rising in a few minutes from the beach to a depth of from two to four feet under the houses in the front row. It was then that many of the people decided to leave their homes and go to the cottages further from the beating surf. But to make one's way against a gale which was breaking off telegraph poles was obviously impossible to say nothing of the knee-deep water swirling down the paths like a mountain torrent. For the men of any family to help the women to a safe place through the wind and water and drifting wreckage would have been a terrible task, and without the help of two young men of Charleston, Mr. A. O. Halsey and Mr. M. S. Hertz, the death record of Atlantic-ville might not have been clear, as it so providentially is, and many of the residents of that portion of the island would have spent a much more dangerous and trying night.

RESCUE WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Mr. Halsey and Mr. Hertz, first got their own families safely to the cottage of Mr. A. Barton Miller, a substantial bungalow, rather higher than the majority, and then started to help other distressed cottagers to this refuge. The wind was blowing harder each minute, and it was an exhausting and perilous task to venture out into the storm at all. But these two men, both of them blessed with extraordinarily strong physique, made trip after trip to the neighboring cottages, and returned with drenched and exhausted women and children, in some cases having carried the women for a hundred yards against the full force of the hurricane. On one trip, they had been blown off of the road and into the deep ditch, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that they had been able to get back to the house. Yet after a short rest they were off again bringing in more people from threatened houses and carrying assistance to neighboring cottages.

storm increased in fury and the island was completely inundated in many places. The houses rocked like cradles, some left their foundations; people had to stand on tables and with the furniture dashing all about the inside of the houses and logs battering the outside, the smashing up of the houses seemed to be imminent and the stress of mind and body can not be described. Splendid work of rescuing individuals and families was done by the soldiers, the rescued people being taken to safe places over its splendid plant to its afternoon neighbor.

The management of The Evening Post is grateful for this assistance and sincerely appreciates the succor given in a time of distress.

The newly constructed People's office building also suffered in the storm. The big steel and stone building probably did not sway and shake as most buildings did last night, but it was damaged to the extent of having a good deal of the bronze cornice work wrenched off.

The metal was curled in several instances for a considerable distance, showing how the breezes flew at that elevation above the street.

The police deserve commendation in their activity toward saving the public from dangers due to the hurricane. The officers have roped off a number of places which are hazardous and which should not be approached. By so doing the department is doing a meritorious work.

Several of the policemen during the storm performed brave deeds in assisting those who were in distress. The officers did not balk at the danger to themselves, but acted promptly and effectively.

office shortly before the bridge was washing their danger the party started for the boat, but it was impossible to make it, and only Mr. Perry reached the Lawrence, the others taking refuge in the office of the ticket office. About five minutes after Mr. Perry reached the Lawrence, he was joined by Mr. Clean and the other Columbian and was told that the ticket office had blown down and Mr. Smith had been killed instantly, and also one of the motormen of the Consolidated company, Mr. Carter. It was impossible to reach the wharf until early this morning.

Mr. Perry left yesterday afternoon for Mount Pleasant, where he will take charge of Mr. Smith's remains after the coroner's inquest has been held. Mr. Smith was thirty-five years of age, and lived in Columbia for about two years and a half. He had only been married about two years. The deceased had no children surviving him.

STORM AT NAVY YARD

Baltimore Broke Loose From Her Moorings—125 Miles Per Hour

Although the hurricane seemed to develop force in the suburbs, the Charleston Navy Yard suffered no serious damages, as far as could be learned.

The training ship Baltimore got loose from her moorings during the storm, but, fortunately, the officers and men were looking out for just such an emergency, and hardly had she broken away from the piers before she was again fastened with steel hawsers and made fast. The strong pier never moved and the big ship remained afterwards fast. If the Baltimore had not so promptly been tied again she would have broken up and a great damage would have been done to the wharf.

It is said that the wind reached a force of one hundred and twenty-five miles an hour at the Navy. It was harder than anything of the kind that the officers and men generally had encountered, and they do not want to see another.

CONSOLIDATED SUFFERS.

Company Intends to Restore Service as Soon as Possible.

Mr. P. H. Gadsden, president of the Consolidated Company, stated this morning that the property of the railway and lighting departments suffered great damage in the city. It is thought that the Seashore Division loss will greatly augment the damage. Lines in every direction were blown down, poles uprooted and generally the entire system severely battered up. Wrecking crews were sent out at once to clear up the debris. Mr Gadsden said the trolley circuit of the company would be the first turned on, as he feared live wires if the electric current were attempted until a thorough examination of every house and store were made. No definite time was fixed for the resumption of the electric cars Announcement will be made later

FIRST TRIP ACROSS BAY

Gasoline Launch Eagle Bird Brings Tidings From Mount Pleasant

The stanch little gasoline launch Eagle Bird, belonging to Mr Patten braved the rough sea of the harbor early today and successfully made the trip from Charleston to Mount Pleasant.

The captain of the Eagle Bird brought the first news to the city and anxious ones crowded the dock in heaps of conditions. Later in the day the Eagle Bird with its brave crew, started for the Isle of Palms.

FROM THE OBSERVATORY

By G. F. Blaisdell

LUBIN'S amateurish "Archibald, the Hero," presents two director's blunders that are so glaring they are worth noting. Archibald's father, in Philadelphia, receives an invitation from a friend in Texas to send on his ladylike son for a little physical culture. The delighted father calls in his son and immediately afterward writes a message, which, as the parent still sits at his table, is flashed on the screen. It reads: "Received at——Cow Boy, Texas." Must be some new form of sending blanks. After the dear child has been through a mild adventure at the "ranch," he receives a note from the sheriff announcing the escape of the "outlaw" in whose capture he had played such a ridiculous part, and appealing for assistance in the recapture. Archibald puts the note on a post and writes a reply underneath the message sent to him. As the copy is reflashed on the screen, lo, and behold! Archibald's handwriting is identical with that of the sheriff. Child's work!

Police Sergeant Jeremiah O'Connor, the bureau of censorship of Chicago denies that a woman is to censor the films for the Windy City. As the story was printed here it was understood that "Serge" had put a girl on the job. Nothing was said about a woman.

The Olympic Theater, in Portsmouth, Va., has been showing a film depicting persons and scenes connected with the Beattie murder. One of the local papers announces that the house will probably be crowded all afternoon and evening. Among the pictures shown is that of "the" bloodstained automobile. The name of the manufacturer of this new kind of educational film is not given.

Announcement is made in the District of Columbia that there is nothing in the laws of the District to prevent Beulah, as she is familiarly described in the newspapers, from appearing on the screen or on the stage so long as the show is not obscene. It may be that it is the intention in Washington to give Beulah the role of the angel in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Certainly if one may judge the young woman by the evidence in court or by the stories printed in this part of the country, it is difficult to understand what object other than greed could induce any manufacturer to "star" this person. There are different ways of capitalizing human frailty, some ways as old as the old earth. This latest way seems to be different in form only.

It is with pleasure that one reads the statement of Mr. Brylawski, of the Washington Exhibitors' Association. Mr. Brylawski points out that it is the intention of the leaders in the association to show at all times in their theaters only pictures which any woman or child would enjoy seeing or which would profit them. Pictures depicting the Binford girl, he said, are not desired in the theaters controlled by the association.

The lecture delivered at the Majestic Theater, in Brooklyn, in description of Kinemacolor's coronation pictures must have been written by an Englishman who had never been in America. It may be true that even here there are some natives, who, like Tommy, "dearly love a lord." At the same time, there must be many who find such expressions as the "commoner people," used, for instance, in describing the throngs journeying to the Derby as distinguished from those who sat in the royal inclosure, in extremely bad taste, to say the least. To many others—and not necessarily stern old Democrats, either—it was offensive. So far as the beholders could perceive, the people in carriages and afoot appeared to be eminently respectable; and that is a quality that has been denied to some occupants of the hyperexclusive precincts.

It was interesting to note the applause that greeted the announcement of the different detachments. The Scotch, the Irish, the South Africans, all received a warm "welcome." It was to the Canadians, however, that on this particular evening went the bulk of the handclapping, an incident significant of the growing importance of the British dominions to the north of us.

The final reel of the evening, "A Coaching Trip Through Wales," was splendid. If there is one feature of kinemacolor that stands out over all its others, it is the reproduction of old ocean. In this it is in a class by itself.

Fire Commissioner Johnson, of New York City, says that in the more congested sections of the city there are many potential Canonsburg tragedies. All the department can do, he says, is to order the installation of sand, fire buckets, hooks and axes. He states further that there are many places where inside galleries run around the entire room, and where the stairways leading from these galleries open down upon the main floor and not to any outside exit. He says if the law vested in the Fire Department instead of the Building Department authority over these houses he would arrange matters differently, although he admits the Building Department is restricted in its action by existing laws.

It is to be hoped that some day New York City will have a Bureau of Picture Theaters, so that the control of houses may be centralized. As it is now, a man fitting up a place of business has to interview numberless municipal functionaries.

Here's a specimen of newspaper inaccuracy worth reprinting. It is from the Toledo Blade:

"Nat Wills earned $800 in a half-hour before the Thanhouser film camera this summer."

Aside from the fact that Nat Wills did not pose for the Thanhouser camera, but for the Powers, this spring, the story may be all right.

A theatrical manager, on his return from Europe recently, said that the price of orchestra chairs in the best New York playhouses will soon be advanced from $2 to $3. Don't believe it. Before the picture men get into the stretch the theaters may be quite contented if they are able to fill their orchestra seats at the $2 rate. Just paste this in your hat.

Moving pictures will play an important part in New York City's second annual budget exhibit, which will be held under municipal auspices from October 2d to 31st. Three floors at 330 Broadway will be used for displays of charts, models, diagrams and literature relating to various city problems.

Proximity to open-air moving picture shows is a new form of "unearned increment." One New York City apartment house superintendent has been describing how his fears over the establishment of an airdome turned to rejoicing.

"I do not know when I was more provoked," the superintendent is quoted as saying, "than when I first learned that a moving picture contraption was going in on the corner lot next door. I was sure it was going to add unending woes and troubles to my then none too pleasant life as a superintendent. At first I thought I would resign my position, and only deferred that action to give the matter further consideration. For a while my fears seemed to be well founded, for some of my best tenants came to me and made complaints. I told them I was powerless, as were the owners of the building, to prevent the nuisance from being established. One family moved away.

"Well, the first few nights of the entertainment worked a wonderful transformation in the sentiment around our way. You could see entire families who occupied apartments facing the big, white screen in the lot below filling the windows and apparently enjoying the novelty of sitting in the quiet and comfort of their home and being able to look out upon the moving pictures free of cost.

"Now the windows are filled every night. Mothers are able to keep their children at home. Some of our tenants are giving moving picture parties, and many other new orders of things have resulted. One of our apartments was vacated last week and we had several persons bidding against one another for a lease. The result was we got $4 a month more for the apartment than we ever did before. A father with five small children got the lease, and he was tickled to death when he moved in.

"It is a great innovation, when you think it over, to be able to view moving pictures until you tire and then lie down on a couch or window seat and hear popular songs sung until you drop off to sleep."

A film manufacturing company capitalized at $250,000 is to be organized in Kansas City, Mo. It is said the capital is nearly all subscribed. The company will build its own plant, and will employ about fifty actors and actresses. Most of the capital is said to have been contributed by some big manufacturers who believe there's an excellent opening for a film company in Kansas City, owing to its accessibility to the ranch and Indian life of Oklahoma and the great farm lands of Kansas. The activities of the company will be devoted principally to the production of two, three and four reel Biblical plays. Charles D. Hammond, editor of the Thespian, a Kansas City theatrical magazine, predicts that Kansas City is destined to become the theatrical center of the Southwest.

Out in Hood River, Ore., a petition containing 200 names was presented to the council praying that the three picture houses be closed on Sunday evenings. It seems that some one recently made a canvass of the churches on a Sunday evening and then took in the shows. He found a hundred people in the churches, but in the shows he counted five hundred. Surely something wrong here. But there's still more to this story. The Rev. Mr. Hargraves, of the Baptist Church, has divided the churchmen of the town into hostile camps. Mr. Hargraves refused to sign the petition. He took the amazing ground that there was no sanity in attempting to pass laws designed to compel a person to correct a moral habit.

So long as the Rev. Mr. Hargraves remains on his job, Hood River should continue to be an enlightened community.

Edward B. McLean, the son of John R. McLean, of the Washington Post, and who married in 1908 the daughter of Thomas F. Walsh, of Colorado, treated the men and women guests at a big dinner recently held at his home in Bar Harbor to a private exhibition of the pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight. In order that the summer colonists also might have a look at the "scrap," McLean loaned the films to the local theatrical man. Under a new law in Maine prohibiting such exhibitions, the authorities arrested the proprietor and two of his assistants.

Mr. McLean was not arrested.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., September 6.—It can be said of motion pictures that they caused more excitement and speculation in this city the past week than if Andrew Carnegie had suddenly decided to give up the comforts of his Scotland estate and bring his belongings, libraries and all, to this booming and bustling resort. Furthermore, we understand the full meaning of the word Imp now, for the half reel of that product, entitled "Views of Hot Springs, Ark.," raised a little Hades all its own and had the whole town in general and the Business Men's League in particular guessing.

In one of my letters two weeks ago I mentioned the fact that negotiations had about been concluded with an Independent company, one that was not connected with either the general film or the sales corporations, to loose a reel of pictures, backed up by a plot, depicting the wonders of this city, when what does Imp do but crimp the entire scheme. Simply busted up the whole works and the deal is off. "Ain't it awful, Mabel?"

In looking over the Moving Picture News I noted in the release of the Sales Company the aforementioned pictures, which were first exhibited August 28. I couldn't understand it, for the latest information I received about these pictures, so far as the officials of the Business Men's League were concerned, was to the effect that the deal was closed but that no date had been set for their release. And here came Imp and scored a "scoop." I carried the news to the Business Men's League, and my genial friend, the cultured assistant secretary of that progressive organization, Mr. Barnette, could not understand it, either. He called up Mr. Belding, the secretary, the man who is given credit for having more "ginger" and a better and more persuasive flow of the English language than is found, respectively, in a bottle of tabasco sauce or Webster's unabridged, and, like Moses when the "glim" went on a strike, he, too, was in the dark. It was a trying situation, and much speculation ensued. No one knew whether or not the man who took the pictures of the city, as per agreement with the Business Men's League, had "double crossed" that organization, or whether some other party all unknown, minus the advantage of a press agent and other advertising features, had quietly slipped into the city, 'copped" the views he wanted and as quietly left before any of us could grasp his hand and murmur: "That was awfully good of you, old sport."

The local papers gave the pictures much publicity and opinion was divided as to who took them. It was stated in one paper that Mr. Stacy, the jolly Vitagraph man who was here when Bill Dahlen and his tribe of Trolley Dodgers were training for the present baseball season, was the gentleman who was responsible, but as for myself I could not see how Stacy was guilty, considering that he was allied with a Trust company and there had been no mention made, so far as I knew, that he was working the camera for Imp, and even if he had gone over to Carl Laemmle, it was a safe bet that the pictures he may have taken for the Vitagraph people did not go with him.

On August 29 one of the Postal Telegraph operators in Dallas, Tex., called up Mr. Edwards, who has charge of the Postal interest in this city, and the Dallas man sent this query humming over the wires:

"One of the theaters here is showing pictures of Hot Springs. They have an ostrich and alligator farm in them. Have you people got anything like that there?"

Edwards replied that we sure had some fine birds and alligators that had voted the Democratic ticket when Bryan first ran for president, and been regular ever since, too, and that is "some loyalty," and all of the Dallas-Hot Springs wire repartee set us guessing again.

To complicate matters, there wasn't a house in the city that could show the pictures, that the people, owing to the newspaper publicity, were most anxious to see, for the reason that every one of them were using Trust material. And thus we "stewed" for three long and exciting days, getting weary over the argument. The New Era, in commenting editorially on the fact that none of the houses dared show the pictures for fear of getting "canned" from the Trust fold, scored that corporation bitterly and ridiculed the local managers for not having the nerve to give their patrons pictures that every man, woman and child residing here were anxious to see. You note we were quite peeved.

Friday, Manager Morrison, of the Scenic, met me and told me that he had made arrangements to show the Hot Springs pictures and that they would be on view at his theater Saturday. Morrison, together with the management of the Photo Play, recently lost the Trust license when, running pictures from the General Film Company, they featured "The Fall of Troy," and they have only recently been reinstated.

The people of the city rose up and called him blessed, and Mr. Morrison was "some hero." The trust—rats! He intended to run those pictures in spite of all the Trusts that Senator Elihu Root ever dreamed of defending or Judge Landis ever hoped he might fine.

Did not the people of the city want to see whether or not they had been "filmed?" Was there not a situation that reflected on the gameness of ye manager? Also, well, of course the pictures would draw the crowd, and all the local scribes, including yours truly, pitched in and most willingly heralded the glad tidings that "Hot Springs would have the one chance to see itself in moving pictures."

Saturday came, the weather was fine as any prayed for by Prohibitionists in a "wet" and "dry" campaign, but when it came time to open the Scenic for business the pictures had not arrived. Was Mr. Morrison angry? No, gentle reader, he just bit a few tenpenny nails in two. Was the crowd disappointed? Well, some of them looked about as cheerful as a murderer who is informed by the foreman of the jury that he will headline a little hemp specialty under the personal supervision of the sheriff.

But, Lord bless us, the pictures finally got here in great shape. That, however, did not ease Mr. Morrison's troubles. Some unknown party, after entering the theater and witnessing "Captain Kate," a Selig reel, which, by the way, was a "pippin," thought that the little manager of the Scenic was bluffing, and it wasn't long before the 'phone rang in the office of Chief of Police Leonard and a voice informed that genial official that Morrison was getting money under false pretense; that he was passing off a reel of pictures and telling the people they were views of Hot Springs. Remember, please, that the person who sent in that lying report hadn't even waited to see if Morrison had the real pictures. In less time than it takes me to write it Secretary Belding, accompanied by Mr. Simon Cooper, another prominent member of the Business Men's League, was on the scene, and no sooner had they made their appearance than Detective Laughlin also arrived. Laughlin ordered the sign taken down and Morrison told him—well, never mind what he told him. Suffice to state that he was invited to go into the theater and "take a look," after which the situation was explained. And that's the history of the Hot Springs pictures.

Just a word to Imp. What you did, Imp, you did very well, but why in "Sam Hill" didn't you give us more of them? There were several other points of interest that the gentleman you got the pictures from—and Secretary Belding states that they are the same pictures that were taken under the auspices of the Business Men's League by a gentleman from Chicago—included, but as a Hot Springs picture, the kind that would be a great "boost" for the town, they fell short, due solely to the fact that there wasn't enough of it. How about the Army and Navy Hospital? Also a bigger view of Central Avenue, to say nothing of the entire "Bath House Row," and points of interest on the Government reservation? There were many, many things we hoped to see that were missing, but what you did get, Imp, you got O.K.

The Princess Theater opened its regular vaudeville season Labor Day with an exceptionally good show, five acts and a reel of Independent pictures. Get that? No trust in that house. Every one of the acts was a winner, and the second grand opening was all that its announcement promised.

The Great Western Stock company played one of the best political dramas, when it staged "The Game," that I have seen since "The Man of the Hour" gained fame. This attraction is on its second week at the Airdome.

There were a number of Trust reels here this week that met with much praise. Biograph's "Sorrowful Example" was in keeping with the usual excellence of that company, and Edison made us laugh at his "Friday, the 13th," while Essanay gave us two good subjects in "The Two Gun Man" and "The Ranchman's Son." The actor who interpreted the part of the "Ranchman" has been doing some excellent work for this company of late. Gaumont, we had five reels from you this week, and all of them were worth looking at. "Frolicsome Flossie" created more laughter than she did disturbance when the picture was taken; "Jimmie" proved to be a delightful "philanthropist"; "A General Strike" demanded and held our attention, and "A Raging Sea" gave us a whiff of the briny, so realistic did it appear. "The Soul of a Violin," while just a little "mushy," was marked by clever work and the appearance of a very pretty leading woman.

When I gazed on "Pop" Lubin's "Atlantic City" reel I wanted to leave my seat and go down on the sands. Many and many a time have I wandered along the old boardwalk and also, too, have passed a few pleasant hours with "Pop" himself, seated on Captain Young's old Ocean Pier, when I'd interview him, but I'll bet "two bits" that "Pop" don't remember now who I am. The seaside picture was a dandy, only it made me homesick for ye olden times "The Arrow Head" was also much enjoyed, "Pop." Vitagraph gave us a delightful comedy in "Birds of a Feather," and their "Second Honeymoon" made a most favorable impression.

The Princess, as stated before, will use Independent pictures, and I suppose if the Trust learns that Manager Morrison, of the Scenic, ran the Hot Springs views they will land on him with both feet. Morrison, however, is ready for them, and in the words of the immortal "Willie": "Let 'er fly, Mac, and damned be he who cries 'let up'!"

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

"WHEN THE LAW CAME"

The above is a thrilling Western drama, a Champion release of September 6th, in which the bright little "Champion Dot" figures in some remarkably clever work. The stage setting of this picture is typically Western, which lends to it a vivid reality only to be arrived at by means of necessary equipment of native paraphernalia. The story of child beating by the liquor-crazed man should bring home to many such, right here in our city, the necessity for temperate and moral living, by impressing them with the horror of the thing. There are many tense moments in this drama. The finale where Dave, who has been accused of the murder of the father of the little girl, is pardoned just as he is about to be hung, through the extraction of the true story of how the father killed himself, from the child by Bertha, the sweetheart of Dave, is a most intense climax.

"BABY PARADE"—FIRST WORK OF ECLAIR CO. OF AMERICA WON FIRST PRIZE AT ASBURY PARK

The first work of the Eclair Company of America was done last week when a picture founded on the Baby Parade at Asbury Park was taken. The picture won the first prize, a beautiful silver cup. The story of the picture runs thus: Three little boys have begged their old grandfather, a war veteran, to tell them some stories of the war. While the old man tells the stories and the children listen in rapt attention, visions of the battle scenes pass over the screen. After the old man has finished his tales the children wander out into the street, and there they find fastened on a post a dodger lying beside them. This is his clue, and straightway under fifteen are admitted. The next scene shows the boys in their room opening their little savings banks. Finding that they have enough money to take them there, they decide to start immediately for Asbury Park to enter the parade. Upon finding that the boys have disappeared, there is general excitement in the household. The father upon going to their room finds the overturned banks with the dodger lying beside them. This is his clue, and straightway he follows them to Asbury, where he views the parade, and in so doing finds the prize winners, they having reproduced the famous picture, "The Spirit of '76" on a float, the flag woven entirely of flowers, so impressed were they by the grandfather's tales. The reel is not yet completed; the final scenes have still to be taken, and it is expected that the picture will be released early in October.

On Wednesday of this week the Eclair Company are making a practical beginning of their work at their plant at Fort Lee, although the studio is still incomplete. However, Mr. McGill and his company are going to be game and install themselves in temporary makeshifts until the studio proper is ready to receive them.

Newport, Wash.—C. A. Fiedler will erect an opera house here.

Columbus, Ind.—John S. Crump will erect an addition to Crump's Theater.

CHICAGO NOTES

Reports in Chicago are as follows: The Laemmle Film Company state that they are handling twenty-five per cent more business than they did a year ago and that if business keeps up reports will show a wonderful increase over the last year. The Globe Company also state that business is great—in fact, all Chicago films, both independent and licensed, are showing to crowded houses.

The Selig Polyscope Company took the Gotch-Hackenschmitt pictures Monday at the South Side Ball Park, and the same evening showed the pictures at the Majestic Theater. Mr. G. P. Hamilton, formerly of the Essanay and American companies, has been engaged as manager of production by the New St. Louis Motion Picture Co. The Anti-Trust Film Company reports a big business for the future, as they have already made arrangements to buy the entire output of Independent films this season.

This will be ready for distribution October 1st, and no expense has been spared to make it complete in every detail. To managers and operators now engaged in the theater business, as well as to those intending to open theaters, this book is recommended as a complete guide for everything necessary for equipping an up-to-date theater.

IMP EMPLOYEES CHECK BIG BLAZE

The fire which started in the underwear factory of Helfand & Abel, manufacturers of ladies' underwear, in the Colonial Building at Columbus avenue and 101st street, was checked by the employees of the Imp Company, which has its offices and factory on the floor above. The building would have been gutted by fire were it not for the prompt action of the employees of the Imp Company.

Captain Clark, of the Fire Department, said that had it not been for the prompt and daring work of the boys who valiantly fought the fire with our pails and fire extinguishers until the firemen arrived, the building might now be a total loss. One of the Imp employees, Jack Cohn, in passing through the hall, smelled his favorite odor and immediately gave the alarm to Mr. Roskam, the superintendent of the plant.

Rushing into the factory, Mr. Roskam and Mr. Cohn grabbed the fire extinguishers and rushed downstairs and tried to extinguish the blaze, and seeing that it was going to be a stubborn fight, Mr. Roskam ran back to the factory and rang the fire drill, and soon had the fifty-five employees marching down fire-escapes and stairs. At one time there were twelve Imp boys playing on the fire with the extinguishers which are always kept handy in the Imp factory. Seeing that the blaze was under control, but not willing to take any chances, the superintendent of the plant called his men back and loaded their arms full of negatives which they carried down the fire-escapes. The rest of the film was put into safes and vaults.

The firemen soon had the blaze under control and there was no damage done to the Imp factory and about $500 damage to the underwear factory.

A word of praise should be given to Jack Cohn, Julius Stern and S. P. Robins, the bookkeeper, who packed up his books and carried them down the fire-escape to safety; Mr. Grandon, the new director, who rescued one of the boys who had fallen over a hose, and to Antonio Gaudio, Eugene Gaudio, Isador Stolzer, Bert Seibel, Abe Heller, Ed Williams, Sam Jacobus, George Rowell, Harry Zeller, and all the other boys who responded so bravely to the call of duty.

Louisville, Ky.—Mrs. T. Hayes will erect a moving picture theater at 326 Market street, to cost $3,000.

Norfolk, Va.—The new Lyric Theater will be erected at Ninth and Broad streets.

Edited by C. W. Long

MY, but this has been a lonesome month—couldn't write a line for the music department—but please don't blame the "music editor," for while the spirit was willing, the flesh was weak—to state the plain facts, "yours truly' has been ailing somewhat inasmuch as my appendix has been on a rampage—but thanks be to the good, careful care of the kind doctor, I am able to sit up and take notice, so will do my best to make up for lost time.

B. D. De Bord writes: I am a subscriber to the Moving Picture News, and to say that the music department has been a help to me is putting it very mild. You have not only been of great help to me with your suggestions as to what to play, how to play it, and when to play it, but you have enabled me to see some of my own faults. The department is indeed of great help to me, and I am sure that anyone who will follow the advice as you give it will improve in the playing for pictures. Let the good work go on.

Answer: We are indeed glad to note that you are pleased with the work of the music department, also glad it has been of help to you. Letters such as yours makes us feel that our work has been beneficial to the musicians.

"Drummer" from Nebraska writes: "In your issue of June 24, you say: 'Do not at any time try to burlesque a picture or produce comedy yourself where none is intended, as it only cheapens the value of your music to those who know how it should be played—the others will like any kind.' I have just been playing for a picture in which a baby cries in a great many of the scenes—now if a drummer is supposed to imitate as nearly as possible the real sounds such as would be heard, why should not a baby cry be used?"

Answer: It is very true, I did say not to insert any comedy yourself or try to produce a laugh where none is intended. The average audience usually has three or four people in it who will laugh at anything at any time, but it is a safe bet that nine times out of ten you would spoil a serious scene by using the baby cry. Use your gray matter a little—your head was not made to be used as an ornament.

I have just received a copy of the Moving Picture Pianists' Album" from the F. B. Haviland Music Publishing Company, 125 West Thirty-seventh street, New York City. The volume contains sixty-four pages of all classes of melodies, adapted to all classes of pictures, and it is a volume that should appeal to the pianists of moving picture theaters. At the price asked (50 cents) none should be without it.

For the benefit of musicians who are out of employment or who are seeking a change of location, as well as managers who are desirous of obtaining musicians, we are going to start a "want column" for each, and for this we are going to practically print them for nothing, that is, we are going to insert them for one cent a word. But this rate only covers the two branches mentioned. If you are desirous of securing employment, or are in need of musicians, this is the greatest offer that could be made, so in the words of the "fire sale merchant"—"come early to avoid the rush." While we will not guarantee that the musicians we may place are the best, yet at the same time we will endeavor to secure the best talent available at all times.

Having been asked how fast a "hurry" should be played—and the difference between a "hurry" and "agitato"—will do my best to enlighten some on the subject.

The term "hurry" is only a slang phrase applied to the term "agitato." While in the proper sense they are one and the same, yet some make a distinction and use the "hurry" for the rougher form, and the "agitato" for the lighter and more emotional form.

There is a great scope to this one part of dramatic music. Agitation can be physical or mental, violent or subdued, just as you see depicted on the stage and will run from subdued quiet to intense action. In playing for such scenes your music will run from pianissimo to fortissimo and vice versa according to the action of the picture, and you will usually find, if you are using dramatic music, that such will be marked 'p' and 'f' according to action.

As the term "hurry" indicates, it is to be played fast. It is to be used in scenes of excitement, etc., and must be played to convey that idea.

I have been asked by a correspondent who has just lately started to play for pictures what kind of music to procure and how to use it.

I am more than pleased to receive letters of this kind, as it proves the writers are sincere in what they write and are not writing merely out of curiosity.

Any set rule or regulation of playing for pictures cannot be laid down, or followed, as the pictures are too varied; it rests entirely with the musicians, on their own application, experience and individuality. I have given a general idea of the principle in former articles. Every picture presents its own theme and problem peculiar to that one picture alone.

Having been asked a number of times for a list of national airs and songs common of other countries, I submit the following list; while not complete, it will help in a number of cases.

America: "America," "Red, White and Blue," "Star-Spangled Banner," "Yankee Doodle."

Songs of the South: "Dixie," "Old Black Joe," "My Old Kentucky Home," "Suanee River," "Massa's in the Cold, Cold Ground."

England: "God Save the King" (the same as America)," "Rule Britannica," "Tommy Atkins."

France: "The Marseillaise."

Germany: "Die Wacht Am Rhein."

Ireland: "The Wearing of the Green," "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Garry Owen," "Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms," "Come Back to Erin."

Norway: "Astri Mi Astri," "Ja Vi Elsker Detta Londet."

Russia: "God Save the Czar."

Spain: Selections from "Carmen," "La Sorella," "Senora Waltzes," "Caramba."

Sweden: "A Jenta O Ja," "Ur Svenska Hjertans," "Om Dagen Did Mitt Arbete," "Domare Dansen." "Neckens Polska," "Du Gamla Du Fria," "Nulla Dansen," "Och Flickan Hon Gar I Dansen."

Cuban Battle Hymn: "Hymno Bayamés."

DAVID COPPERFIELD

The Thanhouser Company is now preparing to release that most popular of Charles Dickens' tales "David Copperfield." While this will be a three-reel production (regular release), it will not be what one might strictly term a serial, because special care has been taken to make each reel a complete story in itself, dependent on none of the others. The result is that the play has been divided into three periods, so that the first reel will bear on its opening title "The Early Life of David Copperfield, First of the Series from the Novel by Charles Dickens." The second reel will be called "Little Em'ly and David Copperfield, Second of the Series from the Novel by Charles Dickens," and the third "The Loves of David Copperfield, Third of the Series from the Novel by Charles Dickens."

Extraordinary success has been attained in an endeavor to make each reel complete in itself. The first will be released early in September on a Tuesday, the other two following on successive Tuesdays. Special literature and advertising matter will be provided in due time.

BERTRAM ADLER

We regret to announce that Bertram Adler, advertising manager of the Thanhouser Company, is seriously ill with typhoid fever, being confined in the Lebanon Hospital, where he was taken about a week ago. The News tenders its most sincere sympathy and with Mr. Adler's many friends will await reports from his bedside with the hope for a speedy recovery and a return to complete health. Mr. Leon J. Rubenstein is temporarily filling Mr. Adler's place with the Thanhouser Company.

CHARLES SIMONE

Mr. Charles Simone is again back at his desk with the Nestor Company after his recent indisposition and again prepared to handle the publicity campaign for this company. ""Charlie" is a big success in this capacity and has not only the ability to put his ideas in telling style but the goods to back his arguments, for their famous Western and Mutt and Jeff pictures have won for him and the company a most enviable reputation.

"THE STAGE ROBBERS OF SAN JUAN"

American Release, Sept. 11

"When thieves fall out, honest men get their due," is an apt quotation, but in this American picture, the thief also comes in for his share. Stage robbers are busy in San Juan County and the robbers seem to have advance information, whenever anything of value is carried.

One day after a successful holdup, Slippery Jim is dividing the haul between Tom Haley, his partner, his wife, and himself, when Tom objects to Slippery's wife sharing in the plunder. Slippery thinks otherwise as the risk is as great for his wife as it is to them. Tom becomes abusive and Slippery resents it with a blow. Tom departs in anger, and riding toward town he comes upon a sign recently posted by the sheriff, offering $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the San Juan stage robbers. A plan forms itself in his mind to be revenged on Slippery, and also obtain the reward money. Riding to the sheriff's house he tells him that he will take him to the stage robbers. The sheriff calls a posse and led by Tom they ride to the old adobe ruin that has been the robbers' rendezvous.

Slippery's wife is tired of the life of crime and she pleads with him to go to Mexico and live straight. They have just decided to do so, when looking up they see the posse approaching. Taking up their spoils they ride away, hotly pursued by the posse. Slippery is shot in the arm, but they manage to elude their pursuers in the dense thicket, and the posse search for them vainly, and then return to town. Tom Haley knows that his partner must be in one of the hiding places frequently used by them when hard pressed, and continues his search alone. He comes upon Slippery in a secluded dell, his wife having gone for water to cleanse his wound. He forces the wounded man to mount, and takes him to the sheriff. Slippery is placed in jail, and Tom becomes the town hero. Aside from the reward offered the boys take up a collection for the treacherous partner.

When Slippery's wife returns to the hiding place, she finds her husband gone and knowing that he must be captured turns her horse toward town to attempt his rescue. En route she passes a hut and sees Tom Haley come out with a shovel and start furtively down the road. She follows him and sees him bury the reward money, and then she goes to the jail to find Slippery busy filing at the bars of his cell. He forces them out and climbing through the window, he writes a note for the sheriff. They go to the adobe ruin and securing the mail bag ride to where Tom cached the reward money and substitute the mail bag for the gold. Then they start on their journey to Mexico to begin life anew.

The sheriff visits the jail to find his bird has flown, and seeing the note he opens it and reads:

"Sorry I could not stay for breakfast. Keep your eye on the stage robber that brought me in. Slippery."

Taking the note to the stage driver, he shows it to him and asks him if he can identify the other robber that was with Slippery when they held him up. They find Tom at the hut, follow him, and watch him dig up the mail bag that Slippery placed there in place of the gold. His angry cursing is interrupted by the sheriff and the stage driver, who make him prisoner and lead him away.

Safe across the border, Slippery and his wife pause and look back, then set their faces resolutely forward to a new home and an honest life.

Here are dexterity of plot, glancing play at wit, and interesting characters that point a moral while amusing you.

"THE MOTHER OF THE RANCH"

American Release, Sept. 14

James Collins leaves his dear old mother and goes West where he becomes connected with the Bar Diamond outfit. He finds the life of a cowboy arduous and the pay meager. The possibilities of owning a herd of his own by blotting brands or branding calves, occurs to him, as it has to many others, who desire quick results from very little effort, and six months later he is a full-fledged cattle thief, branding cattle, under his own registered brand, while ostentatiously an honest cowboy in the employ of the Bar Diamond ranch.

He writes his mother of his success and she, never dreaming of the hazardous occupation her son is following, plans to join him in the West.

Jim grows reckless in his branding and starts blotting his employer's brand. It is soon noticed by the cowboys and they keep a sharp watch for the cattle thief.

At last the ranchman himself discovers the rustler branding cattle, and riding over alone he is surprised to find one of his own men engaged in the nefarious work. He bitterly rebukes him and Jim, drawing his gun, shoots his employer, and then attempts escape. The shot is heard by the cowboys and they come riding over to find their employer dead.

They start after the rustler, and after a long chase they run him down and he is shot. Ed Neville, the foreman, finds a locket hanging around the rustler's neck and removes it, and the boys carry the body away. Soon a heap of dirt on the prairie marks a murderer's grave, and the cowboys put the last spade of dirt on the mound and hurry back to the bunkhouse.

They are discussing the rustler's crime when a livery rig drives up to the bunkhouse, and a dear old white-haired lady alights and asks for James Collins, explaining that she is his mother.

All the chivalry in their nature is aroused, and the boys determine that this innocent mother shall never know that her son died a criminal and a murderer.

They take her into the bunkhouse, and then hurry away to the rustler's grave, and cover it with flowers.

On their return Ed. Neville gently informs her that her son had died an heroic death, and had begged that the locket he wore he returned to his dear mother. They escort her to the rustler's grave and there leave her, that she may be alone with her grief. As she has no ties in the East, the boys ask her to remain with them and be the mother of the ranch.

The picture closes with the boys all gathered around her.

A beautiful and appropriate finish to a film that will entertain and hold your interest from the flash of the title to the end.

"CAIN'S RETRIBUTION"

Ambrosio Release, September 13

Two peasants love the same girl. The rejected suitor drugs the horse of his rival and the animal plunges over a steep cliff. As time goes on the culprit wins the favor of the girl, but his conscience conjures up accusing visions of the dead man until, mad from fear, he leaps off the very cliff from which his rival met his death. On the same reel is

"Tiny Tom Wins a Lottery Prize"

A delightful story, acted by the tiniest actor in Europe. The winning of a rich prize transforms him into a rich man, and he starts out to enjoy life. He has some gallant adventures, including a fierce duel with a jealous husband.

"FAITH"

Rex Release, Thursday, September 14th

When we lose the goods of the world, we lose but that which was acquired with travail and tempest and tears; and when after striving and securing, these material possessions are forfeited by folly or confiscated by fate, we are still no less rich and just as poor. But when we lose trust and truth and faith, faith in the Judge and His justice, faith in ourselves and our fellows, we are indeed the most forlorn of failures and the poorest of God's mendicants. For the things of the earth are hollow, and the pomp and power they bestow are but shallow, and they bring to our healed hearts sweet satiety, and soothe us with the poetry of the infinite.

The Rev. Barton loses faith in the gospel he preaches, and determines to continue his hypocrisy no longer. He resigns from the church, and leaving a note to his wife and child, he goes out into the world, choosing its wide path of thorns and throes, of sneers and tears. He drifts West and once again resumes man's old battle with the earth, not for its life-sustaining fruits and foods, but for the yellow gold which through the ages has made hearts yellow, hands red, souls black.

Days—and human hearts—break; days—and human hopes—wane; five years elapse. The barren battle is won. He finds gold, but it does not bring him the happiness he bartered for it, and he determines to return to civilization and find contentment in the cities. In making the trip across country, he falls from his horse and injures himself, and he is compelled to seek shelter in a miner's hut. The country round about is famous—or infamous—for the daring desperadoes that infest it, and Barton, suspicious of his host, is on the alert to discover any treachery or deceit. He does not partake of the food offered him, and when the miner and his family retire, he prepares to stay awake and watch his gold. Sitting moodily before the fireplace, he hears the miner's little daughter reciting her prayers. At once his fears vanish, his suspicions disappear. "They are people of God!" he cries. "They are pure!" Then—he asks himself the question that has harassed man since the first of him saw the dim light, the answer to which we can find nowhere but within ourselves. Why, because they read the Bible, did he lose fear? And the answer comes to his heart; he hears "the small still voice," the wandering music of the world, the echo of infinity, and the realization comes to him—when faith comes, fear goes.

The next morning he departs, and returns to the scene of his former life. His wife and child had strayed away; he seeks them and some Power causes him to find.

Fate itself is conquered by faith.

"THE COBBLER"

Reliance Release, September 13

George Hines (Henry Walthall) is a struggling cobbler, living with his wife and his daughter, Ethel (Gertrude Robinson). A young man coming in to have his shoes repaired shows him a lottery ticket and explains to him the possibility of winning large fortunes for a small investment.

The cupidity of the cobbler is aroused and he goes out and buys a ticket. Some days later he receives a list of the winning numbers and finds he has won the capital prize of $10,000.

As he is planning to enjoy the money his wife dies. He rents a nice apartment and send his daughter to a boarding school. The money seems to him a colossal fortune and he stops working, becoming entangled with a card-playing, drinking coterie.

He receives a telegram from Ethel stating that the school has been destroyed by fire and that she is coming home. She has become attached to another girl, and visits at her home, meeting her brother, Jim Bentley (James Cooley), and the two fall in love.

Jim proposes to the girl and is accepted. His parents visit the home of their prospective daughter-in-law to meet her father, and that worthy enters the room in a state of intoxication. Mr. Bentley is disgusted; his wife is shocked; his son is hurt, and Ethel is so mortified it is with difficulty that she keeps the tears from running down her cheeks.

Hines manages to stumble through an introduction, and departs for a nearby saloon.

Mr. Bentley, wishing to know more about Hines, engages an information bureau to secure a report, and they advise him that Hines is addicted to gambling and drinking, and is entirely unreliable. Bentley then commands his son to break the engagement, but the youth remains loyal to the girl.

Bentley thereupon writes a note to Hines, informing him that he cannot permit his son to marry Hines' daughter. The letter reaches Hines as he has squandered the last of his money, and is moodily telling himself what a fool he has been. Ethel is broken-hearted, and Hines is remorseful for having shattered the life of his daughter.

Ethel lovingly embraces him, and they resolve to begin all over again. The furniture is sold at auction to satisfy the outstanding debts, and he again secures the little cobbler's shop.

Jim goes to call upon the girl and finds the house vacant, and an agent tacking a "To Let" sign up. He traces her back to the cobbler's shop, and knocks at the door. Ethel comes to open it, and for a few moments her pride threatens to prevent a reconciliation, but she yields to his protestations of loyalty and love.

"AT PERRY'S RANCH"

Nestor Release September 3

Weary and disheartened, Jack Roberts sank down upon the steps of their little cottage—the sole support of his widowed mother, and for weeks he had been out of work. Suddenly, as he glanced over the "want column," his eyes brightened—"Wanted men for Western Railroad; good wages; free transportation." Jumping up, the young man hurried to the address given, and there, although the agent demurred at his size, he was finally commanded to report within the hour.

Upon his arrival in the West, however, the timekeeper, after looking Jack over, sarcastically informed him that they wanted men, not kids. Thereupon an argument arose, for what Jack lacked in inches, he made up for in pluck. Ranchman Perry's timely interference, however, put an end to what might have ended uncomfortably for the young man, after which, Jack very gladly accepted Perry's kind offer to try his luck on the ranch.

As the months flew past, the new cowboy grew to like his work more and more, and ere the year was over, he had sent for his mother. But before she arrived, on account of his attentions to the ranchman's daughter, Jack had been challenged by the foreman to fight a duel. Knowing himself to be put a poor shot, the young man retired to some distance from the bunk-house, put up a target, and started to blaze away, and although each shot went wide of the mark, Jack had become thoroughly interested. Suddenly he heard a cry of pain from the bunk-house. It proved to be Bert Rankin, the foreman, whom the young cowboy had accidentally shot, and notwithstanding the fact that Bert knew the shot was accidental, he angrily accused Jack of shooting him down like a dog, as soon as the boys appeared, and insisted that they send at once for the sheriff.

So it was upon her arrival that Mrs. Roberts found her son in the hands of the sheriff. Hurrying to Bert, she implored him to vindicate her boy; this he at first stubbornly refused to do, but as he drank in her sweet, gentle voice, he suddenly beheld, as in a dream, his own mother, listening to his evening prayer. With a mighty effort the foreman dragged himself to where the boys were assembled—there, in the presence of all, he brokenly confessed the truth.

"BY REGISTERED MAIL"

Imp Release, September 21

Amos Grantly is a poor mechanic with a wife and child to support. Fortune does not favor him in the way of steady work and the family purse is depleted. About this time he receives a letter from a wealthy aunt offering to adopt his only child, little Ethel. Grantly and his wife seriously consider the offer. They love the child but the prospect of having her reared in comfortable circumstances with advantages they find it impossible to give her, is taken into consideration. They weigh the matter carefully and finally, after many misgivings, they consent to the plans of the aunt. There is a tearful parting with the child. Parental love is strong but by a heroic effort they decide to bear up under the sorrow.

After the child is gone the home is desolate; the parents are truly bereaved and their grief is intense. Grantly goes to work and he sees the children of other workmen bring them dinner, happy and contented. He returns home from work to find tots waiting for their parents and he is grief-stricken. The mother misses the child and the parents weep in sorrow with arms clasped about each other.

At first Ethel is delighted with life at the home of her wealthy aunt, who is kind to her. She is surrounded with every luxury, her slightest wish is gratified—but it is not home. She misses her parents and grieves for them. At last she can bear it no longer and determines to return home. She has no money and cannot let her relatives into the secret. She considers the matter and then remembers the kindness of the mailman who delivers letters at her old home.

In her childish ingenuity she conceives the idea of mailing herself home. Securing a stamp, she writes her home address on a paper and pins it on her breast. How she is eventually returned home by the men in the mail service is a pretty story. She is finally carried into the presence of her father and mother by the postman, and their surprise and joy repays her for the return.

"THE GREAT CHARLESTON HURRICANE FLOOD"

Imp Release, September 18th

This is a timely film showing the havoc wrought on the east coast of the Atlantic Ocean the latter part of August, when the waves rolled mountain high and the loss of life and the damage to shipping was great.

The views were taken in Charleston, S. C., and show the fury of the storm vividly. The damage to docks, streets and buildings was almost beyond belief, trees being uprooted by the force of the wind and wharves being dashed to pieces by the fury of the waves, with freight cars overturned and buildings wrecked.

It was the severest storm experienced on the coast for years, and many vessels were lost at sea. The views were taken in the rain and wind by an Imp photographer, who was hastily dispatched to the storm center and succeeded in getting some fine views of the wrecked city.

"THE BICYCLE BUG'S DREAM"

A convict is visited by a minister who offers him consolation. The prisoner conceives the idea of escaping in the garments of the dominie, pounces upon him and exchanges clothing.

Making good his escape from prison, he appropriates a bicycle and a funny chase ensues. There is an exhibition of trick riding that is marvelous, the prisoner being chased. He performs all sorts of seemingly impossible antics to return to prison and again take up a position on his rude bunk. He awakes to discover it has all been a dream and his astonishment is genuine.

Copyrighted, 1911, by Independent Moving Picture Company of America.

"SHENANDOAH"

Champion Release, September 18

In this story of the Shenandoah Valley, a truthful incident of that beautiful region is narrated. It occurred at a time when General Milroy was in the valley. This officer was hated by the people of that section for the reason that his soldiers committed more depredations than any other command in the army.

One day the home of a respectable family was invaded by three drunken soldiers, who among other vile things they did, attempted to desecrate a Confederate flag, which adorned a picture of the lady's deceased husband. She attempted to defend it against the miscreants with her late husband's sword, when at the moment, a Union officer rushed in, kicked out the brutal soldiers and restored the insulted flag. By doing this, he won the admiration of the lady and her beautiful daughter.

In revengeful spirit, the soldiers traitorously gave information to the Southern camp which brought a host of Confederates on the scene. Their leader was not liked by either of the ladies of the household. In the presence of the Union officer, the young daughter was given the alternative of marrying the Confederate leader or seeing the Union officer shot in an hour.

Before the hour arrived, however, the bird had flown, and the volley fired into the room where he had been "trussed up" found lodgment in his old clothes —which had been stuffed to deceive the wily guards. A negro and his "lady love" play important parts in the unfolding of the plot and their grotesque actions are laughable. The scenes of battle and field action are beautiful settings to this martial theme.

"THE STOLEN HORSE"

Champion Release, September 20

In a characteristic Western town, a cowboy dashes up at breakneck speed, heralding the arrival of the new school ma'am. A large crowd gathers. Her coming with the buckboard loaded with grips and trunks is hailed with delight. Every male of age in the village falls head over heels in love with her; but in a few months only two remain at her heels. Of the two, one was a mean fellow who could brook no interference.

It happened when Rose, the teacher, slipped on the rocks and was slightly injured, that Hank Peters, one of the rivals, chanced along. He immediately dispatched his man, who was riding with him, for a doctor. Then came along Ned Lester, the girl's favorite. "Quick," he cried to Hank, "ride for a doctor; my horse went lame." But Hank sneered at him and would not even tell him that a doctor had been sent for. Then Ned rushed for Hank's horse, but Hank pulled his gun and prevented him. Ned dashed away for a nearby barn, which chanced to be Hank's, seized a horse and rode off.

Rose recovered sufficiently to go her way without replying to Hank. The latter soon discovered the loss of the horse, and that Ned had stolen it. Of course he knew for what purpose Ned used it, but it didn't matter to him. Hank wanted to get "even." And so Ned was rounded up in short order by the cowboys, charged with horse-stealing; and the offense meant a rope and a telegraph pole. It looked real bad for the moment.

Rose was clever. She simply placed Ned's horse in Hank's barn, then going to Ned's place of confinement, slipped him a note, informing him of what she did, and for him to say that he had merely swapped horses with Hank. Hank of course denied this, and stated that Ned's horse had never seen the inside of his barn. Several cowpunchers went to investigate, and sure enough there was Ned's horse.

Hank saw he had been outwitted and at last took his medicine like a man. And when Ned and Rose became "one" he gallantly presented her with the horse that had been "traded on him."

"HER UNCLE'S WILL"

Solax Release, September 13th

Ethel Newcomb, a pretty Southern girl, is engaged to Frank Marlow, and they are about to be married. A few days before the wedding she receives news that her uncle, John Waring, has died and left her a large fortune, under the condition, however, that she marry the overseer of her uncle's plantation, Duncan Hale. Should she refuse to marry Hale, she is to lose the money, but should Hale refuse to marry her, she is to get the money.

She talks the matter over with her sweetheart, and they are very much perplexed as to what is best to be done. Ethel's young brother Bob, however, comes to the rescue by suggesting that he dress himself as a girl with an unattractive wig, etc, and make love to the overseer, Duncan Hale. This plan is successfully carried out, and Bob makes himself such an unattractive female that the overseer abandons the money and escapes in disgust. They ultimately get him to sign a paper refusing to marry Ethel Newcomb under the conditions of the will, after which they are happily married, and all ends merrily.

These conditions bring about many laughable scenes, especially where Bob, dressed as a girl, makes love to the overseer.

THE ALTERED MESSAGE

Solax Release, September 15,

Nellie Grant, the popular daughter of the commanding officer at Fort Reno, has singled out Captain West as the successful suitor. She happens in the telegraph room just as the sergeant has received a message commanding her father to put his entire regiment in the field to capture a band of smugglers. The message directs the Colonel to leave Captain Dean in command of the post. Nellie realizes this will take her lover away, and in a spirit of mischief, she alters the message to leave Captain West at the post, instead of Captain Dean.

Later the Colonel receives a telegram asking the name of the officer he left in charge of the post. He realizes a serious mistake has been made, and sends an officer back to the post to place Captain West under arrest and return with him at once. Nellie, horrified at what has occurred, insists upon accompanying the officer and her lover back to the field headquarters. On the way the trio is attacked by Mexican smugglers and Nellie departs posthaste for aid. She makes a thrilling dash for the field camp, and on the way meets her father and Captain Standing. The Colonel directs the Captain to return to his troop and immediately proceed to the rescue of the two imperilled officers.

"THE LOST LETTER"

Bison Release September 12

In a jealous rage, Borden picks a fight with his rival, Moran, and shoots him. Jumping on his horse he gallops away, thinking he has killed Moran. The latter, however, has been grazed by the bullet and gets up, angrily declaring he will get revenge, following Borden. The sheriff to prevent trouble, goes after them. Borden hears the galloping horses, and being hemmed in, decides to destroy himself rather than be strung up. He scribbles a satirical note and shoots himself. The wind blows the letter aside, and Moran's anger vanishes as he sees the lifeless body. The sheriff and posse coming up find Moran bending over Borden, and arrest him. He protests his innocence, but is tried and convicted. His sweetheart finds the letter in the roadway and by a sensational ride saves him from hanging.

"LONE STAR'S RETURN"
Bison Release September 15

Lone Star, in search of adventure, comes upon another tribe of Indians. He makes presents to the Chief and falls in love with the latter's daughter, Laughing Eyes. Young Deer, in love with the girl, seeing himself supplanted, abducts her, and Lone Star pursues him. In his flight Young Deer meets Lone Star's tribe, and, with the girl, is captured and bound. Lone Star, following the trail, comes to his village and orders the girl released. A conference is held and it is decided to forfeit Young Deer's life, and he is taken away by the executioners.

"THE LIE"
Thanhouser Release, Sept. 19

A young artist, and a business man he thought his best friend, were both suitors for the same girl, and the artist won. The broker concealed his rage under the mask of friendship, and the happy couple never dreamed that he was secretly planning revenge.

The broker had a stenographer, an orphan girl, who was the sole support of her little sister. The stenographer was in financial difficulties, and the broker by accident discovered it.

So he proposed to the girl that she aid him in a "little joke," promising that if she did so he would give her, what to her was a large sum of money. Her share in the plot was that she be in the artist's room at a certain hour when the artist would be there, he not knowing of her presence. To strengthen his scheme, the broker introduced the stenographer to write a fervid love note, presumably meant for the artist.

The broker's plot worked to a charm. He managed to secure a wax impression of his rival's doorkey, made a duplicate of it, and gave it to the stenographer. Then he waited his time.

While calling at the girl's house, ostensibly to play chess with her father, he heard the artist tell his sweetheart that he would have to go home early, as he had important work to do. A telephone message enabled the broker to instruct the stenographer to reach the house ahead of the artist, and she concealed herself in an inside room. The note, dropped on the reception room floor was found by the engaged girl, as the broker had planned it, and she hurried off to confront her supposedly recreant lover.

The stenographer was found in the room, and the explanations of the mystified artist were disbelieved. The girl haughtily broke her engagement and the man who had wrecked two lives was happy over the success of his infamous scheme.

But there is generally some little thing that a criminal overlooks that spells defeat in the hour of his apparent triumph. The stenographer and her sister were passengers on a boat, and the artist, broken-hearted and dispirited, was there too. The little sister fell overboard, and the plucky artist, risking his own life, dived over and saved her.

The stenographer realized that the man she had wronged had dared death to help a child, and one that was very dear to her. She did not dare to tell him what she had done, but visited the other woman. To her she confessed everything, blaming the broker, who was present, as the author of the plot.

The artist sat in his studio, too unhappy to work. Life held but little for him, he thought. But in the hour of his darkest dejection, the woman he loved best in the world entered, confessed that she had misjudged him, and promised that if he forgave her, they would go through life together, hand in hand, loving, loyal partners. And the efforts that had been made to part them, in the end, only brought them more firmly together.

"THE HONEYMOONERS"
Thanhouser Release, September 22

A celebrated man who was married five times said on one occasion, "the most trying thing about getting married is the fool tricks one's fool friends play." And he knew what he was talking about.

A young couple found to their horror that their kind acquaintances, not content with the usual rice and old shoes, had captured their wedding coach, and decorated it so that everyone would be "wise" to the newlyweds. So the young couple decided to foil them.

While the groom chatted with the guests the bride cautiously made her escape by the back door, and rolled off to the station in an auto, her husband having agreed to meet her there. And the wedding guests were surprised when the groom rushed out all alone, and they saw that the laugh was on them and not on the young couple.

But fate sometimes plays unexpected tricks. The bride was on the platform when the train pulled in, but the bridegroom tarried. His taxi broke down and he had to sprint all the way to the station. He arrived in time to motion his bride to get on the train. She did so, but he turned a graceful somersault, and when he regained his feet the train had pulled out.

The bride, carried away, finds her woes increasing. She has no money, no tickets, nothing but sorrow. The conductor listens to her gravely, and then puts her off at the next station. Knowing that her husband will undoubtedly take the next train, the bride tramps over the ties, hoping somehow and in some way to reach the city and join him.

In the meantime the unhappy bridegroom finds that the next train will not come along for hours. There is nothing to do except to wait, and he does so. Then when the train is a few miles out it is held up by a freight wreck, and the young man decides that a honeymoon is sometimes worse than a nightmare.

The wreck was cleared away in time, and the train continued along. The husband in the car was telling a sympathetic acquaintance of his unhappy lot. Suddenly he looked out of the window, and saw a little woman crouched by the side of the track, tear-stained and miserable. He recognized her as the bride he had vowed to love and cherish.

Under the circumstances there was only one thing that he could do, and he did it. He pulled the bellrope and stopped the train, regardless of the indignation and horror of the crew. Then rushing madly down the track, he picked up his bride, and they vowed they would go through life hand in hand, because when they were not together, something awful was more than likely to happen.

"THE STAR REPORTER"
Yankee Release, September 18

The wonderful methods pursued by the New York newspapers in issuing a special extra is clearly shown in this magnificent production. The entire equipment of a modern up-to-date newspaper plant has been utilized to produce the proper realism.

When the police, coroner and the public in general had decided that the nephew of Captain Sanford was guilty of his death, it took the sharp eyes of Bess Reynolds, the star reporter of one of the daily newspapers, to detect a flaw in the chain of circumstantial evidence which would probably send an innocent man to the death chair.

Receiving permission from the editor to sift the death of the captain to the very bottom, she follows a plan common among the reporters, and more often acknowledged as superior to the tactics of the detective force, and clears the young man from the charge of murder. But the editor not only wanted to clear up the mystery, but was also looking for a beat. He holds a press in readiness, and when Miss Reynolds brings in her copy it is immediately set up by the waiting compositors, then locked up in a form, rushed to the pressroom, and two minutes later the cry of EXTRA is heard on the street, in the shrill voices of the Metropolitan newsboy.

"THE GIRL AND THE CHAUFFEUR"
Yankee Release September 22d

"Love, like death, levels all ranks,
And lays the shepherd's crook beside the sceptre."

—Lytton.

The summer residents of a famous seaside resort were shocked out of their aristocratic skins one morning by the news of an elopement of one of their pampered daughters with her handsome chauffeur, not to mention the fact that the girl had taken her prize-winning bulldog with her. Gossip immediately began to wag its long tongue and not until then did they realize that the young lady appeared entirely too friendly with the chauffeur.

In spite of every effort made by the parents and relatives of the young woman, the marriage took place in a sleepy little church nestling among the hills of a sleepy little village.

The parents of the eloping bride had been arranging for a marriage of their daughter with a nobleman who possessed an empty title and did not for a moment doubt that their daughter would be flattered by such a union. But the blood of her liberty-loving and democratic ancestors flowed in the veins of the young lady, and when she found that the handsome chauffeur was a thoroughbred, well educated, and a well-bred American, she upset her parents' well-laid plans and promptly fell in love with him.

With the encouragement of the little woman who braved all to be his wife, the young husband soon became a wealthy man and when his father-in-law is on the verge of ruin, he, in a frank and manly way offers him all his money to tide him over his difficulties.

The father then realizes the worth of his son-in-law and freely forgives the eloners and takes them to his heart.

THE CONSPIRATORS

Great Northern Release September 16th

Mr. Wilson, a solicitor, receives a wire from a client who is a confirmed invalid, asking him to call upon him and arrange for the disposal of his stocks and shares. When the wire arrives, Mrs. Wilson is at the office. Bidding adieu to her, her husband accompanies her to the street. His clerk, who is a member of a noted gang of scoundrels, during his absence reads the telegram and hastily prepares a message to the gang, apprising them that there is a good haul to be made. His first epistle does not suit him, and he crumples this up and throws it on the floor. This ultimately brings about his undoing. The clerk leaves the office and joins his confederates, and soon their plans are matured. As Mr. Wilson is hailing a cab preparatory to calling on his client, the gang overpower him and confine him in a dungeon at old Mother S's. Armed with his employer's bag, the clerk then proceeds to call on the client. At the solicitor's office, however, a trusted servant has picked up the incriminating note which says that Wilson must be robbed. He informs Mrs. Wilson, and then Sherlock Holmes is called in. He speedily determines on a course of action, and going to the client, takes that gentleman's place, and is disguised to represent the infirm old man. When the clerk calls, Sherlock Holmes overpowers him and makes him a prisoner. He then disguises himself as the clerk, and goes to the place where Wilson is detained and liberates him. The other members of the gang rush in, but are covered by the detective's pistols. Suddenly one of them pulls a cord by the window and Sherlock Holmes disappears into space below. But the police arrive and overpower the ruffians. They are forced to disclose Holmes' whereabouts and eventually the robbers are consigned to durance vile, and Wilson is restored to his family.

THE NEW HEALY PLAYHOUSE

We present above a picture of the new Healy playhouse in Fort Worth, Texas, which is running Independent releases. Mr. Healy has decorated the lobby with displays advertising the "Parting of the Trails," one of the famous "Flying A" productions.

The above cut was taken from a postal card on the reverse side of which was the following communication:

American Film Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—This is what I do with your great Western features, two of which I receive weekly—Mondays and Thursdays first run. They certainly get the money for me. On "American" days we average 2,000 people daily. The picture, as depicted above, is our lobby display of your film entitled "The Parting of the Trails." The reception accorded it was simply wonderful. R. A. HEALY.

GRAND BALL TO BE GIVEN BY THE SALES COMPANY EMPLOYEES BALL COMMITTEE

We desire to draw the attention of our readers to the ball which is to be given in the near future by the Sales Company Employees Ball Committee. We understand that Saturday, October 14th, is the date set and that the jollification is to take place at the Alhambra Hall, Seventh avenue and 126th street.

A special souvenir program is being prepared, upon which a great deal of thought and artistic work is being expended; so that for the price of $1.00 not only admission and a jolly time is secured, but also a beautiful souvenir such as one would value as a fitting remembrance of a pleasant occasion.

This program will be circulated through the medium of the exchanges throughout the country, and the News has been asked to announce that advertising space in this program is for sale.

We sincerely hope that the manufacturers and others will take advantage of this opportunity for a good advertisement, and also that the Sales Company Employees Ball Committee will have the staunch support of manufacturers, exhibitors, etc., in their effort to prepare a good time for everybody.

The last event of the kind given by the Sales Company Employees Ball Committee was a most enjoyable affair, and it is expected that this time, owing to the elaborate preparations which we understand are in view, they will surpass all previous efforts in hospitality and entertainment.

NICHOLAS POWER COMPANY, 115 Nassau Street, New York

For fourteen years the leading makers of motion picture machines.

REMEMBER THE PAST IN SHAPING THE FUTURE

A year ago the SALES COMPANY was shipping three hundred reels and Patents Company fifteen hundred reels weekly. To-day SALES COMPANY over eight hundred and Patents Company twelve hundred and fifty.

In one short year the Independent cause has been firmly established on a good substantial and legal basis. The Independent manufacturers have not only brought their plants up to a high mark of perfection, doubled the quality and quantity, but have put aside many thousands of dollars to wage a legal war to surround your interests and theirs with the security and protection which was so much required. Eighteen months ago no Independent Manufacturer, Exchange or Exhibitor knew whether his investment was going to be wiped out over-night. To-day all are protected; your business is your own. You are getting a regular supply of film at uniform prices and favorable conditions.

All this has been brought about by Manufacturers, Exchanges and Exhibitors WORKING TOGETHER and the further success we all so earnestly look forward to can BE ACCOMPLISHED only by all of us standing shoulder to shoulder and assisting one another in every possible way.

Quality may not have advanced as rapidly as all desire, but consider the tremendous expense manufacturers have been under and the many other things they have done. Quality, however, is now having first attention. The same grit and determination shown in the past will soon bring our quality up to the required standard.

ONLY HOWEVER IF WE ALL STICK TOGETHER

AN EFFECTIVE, IMPRESSIVE, REALISTIC WESTERN FEATURE.

"The Rustler Sheriff"

Produced in El Cajon Valley, Southern California. A Flying A Cowboy feature. Containing the most effective climax ever pictured in a Western film. A realistic drama of the West as it used to be. True to life—teaching a strong moral lesson—and ending in one of the most unexpected, thrilling, and impressive climaxes ever presented to the gaze of the general public, through the medium of the moving picture camera. A feature from all angles, and in every respect. Different from the "Usual Thing." ALL INDEPENDENT EXCHANGES BUY TWO REELS OF FLYING A FILMS EACH WEEK—RELEASE DAYS MONDAYS AND THURSDAYS. IF YOU ASK THEM FOR THIS FEATURE AND MAKE YOUR REQUEST EXPLICIT YOU WILL GET IT. REMEMBER THE RELEASE DATE—THURSDAY, SEPT 28th. NOTE:—There are two Flying A Cowboy features released each week. Some of these features are better than others, but they are all good. The release days are MONDAYS AND THURSDAYS. Your Exchange will give you both, each week, if you ask for them. THE THANHOUSER TWO-A-WEEK

Lochinvar

RELEASED TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26

This is a delightful romance of the age when knights rode about clad in armor and lords and ladies lived in fortified castles. Lochinvar is a knight who elopes or carries off his bride when she is about to marry a lover forced upon her. Lochinvar steals her from under the very noses of her rival and relatives. Because of that element of love and romance, this story will not fail to get a firm grip on any human being with red blood.

Love's Sacrifice

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29

The oblivious and absent-minded college professor is unintentionally neglectful of his young and charming wife, who loves him dearly. Although their domestic waters become temporarily ruffled and they are separated because of the untrustworthiness of a friend, they later begin to understand each other and are happily reunited. This is one of those tense, heart-throbbing domestic dramas, enacted daily in American homes. The characters portrayed surround us everywhere, for they are human and real.

ELECTRICITY COMMISSIONERS

WE think New York City deserves a whole editorial to itself this week, or to be more correct, one special part of a department of the city does. We principally refer to the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, which has issued an admirable book of some 212 pages under the able editorship of Commissioner Thompson. It is called "The Electrical Code of the City of New York," and has the rules and regulations for the construction, care, maintenance, and operation of all electrical work, apparatus, and appliances in the city.

The Commissioner informed us this is the first time anything of the kind has been attempted by the Department. It was undertaken for the particular benefit of the electrical trade and constructors, but it should be of general use to everyone who uses electricity. The book evinces great care, and took many months in its preparation. It is a "vade mecum" explaining the methods for obtaining various kinds of permits from the Department; the rule under which the Department inspectors work and the general regulations for the construction and maintenance of all kinds of electrical work. We want to emphasize the next point. Very particular attention is devoted to moving picture establishments, and a very valuable series of suggestions for all kind of interior working is included. A copy should be in the possession of every moving picture house in the city as well as the operators of moving picture machines. For the benefit of the majority of our readers we want to emphasize a few of the points. First of all comes moving picture equipment on page 87, and reads as follows:

MOVING PICTURE EQUIPMENT

Arc Lamp Used as a Part of a Moving Picture Machine

Must be constructed, so far as practicable, similar to arc lamps of theaters,* and wiring to same must not be of less capacity than No. 6B. & S. gauge. The leads to the lamp and its rheostat or equivalent device must be protected by a plug cutout or open link fuses, the latter enclosed in an approved cabinet with self-closing door. Cartridge fuses will not be permitted.

Arc Lamps

a. Must be provided with reliable stops to prevent carbons from falling out in case the clamps become loose.

b. All exposed parts must be carefully insulated from the circuit.

c. Must, for constant-current systems, be provided with an approved hand switch, and an automatic switch that will shunt the current around the carbons, should they fail to feed properly.

[The hand switch to be approved, if placed anywhere except on the lamp itself, must comply with requirements for switches on hanger-boards as laid down in No. 73.]

d. Terminals must be designed to secure a thoroughly good and permanent contact with the supply wires, which contact must not become loosened by motion of the lamp during trimming.

Rheostats

Must conform to rheostat requirements for theater arcs. Reactance coils, motor-generators and similar substitutes for resistance coils must be considered as parts of the moving picture machines, and their location must receive the approval of the [Inspection Department having jurisdiction] Commissioner before installation.

Top and Bottom Reels

Must be enclosed in steel boxes or magazines, each with an opening of approved construction at bottom or top, so arranged as not to permit entrance of flame to magazine. No solder is to be used in the construction of these magazines. The front side of each magazine must consist of a door spring-hinged and swinging horizontally and be provided with a substantial latch.

Automatic Shutter

Must be provided and must be so constructed as to shield the film from the beam of light whenever the film is not running at operating speed. Shutter must be permanently attached to the gate frame.

Extra Films

Must be kept in individual metal boxes equipped with tight-fitting covers.

Machine Operation

Must be operated by hand (motor driven will not be permitted.) Departure from this rule will be authorized only under special permission in writing, given in advance.

Machine Enclosure

Machine must be placed in an enclosure or house made of suitable fireproof material; must be properly ventilated, properly lighted and large enough for operator to walk freely on either side of or back of machine. All openings into this booth must be arranged so as to be entirely closed by doors or shutters constructed of the same or equally good fire-resisting material as the booth itself. Doors or covers must be arranged so as to be held normally closed by spring hinges or equivalent devices.

*(For installation rules, see Nos. 21 and 33.)

Theater and Moving Picture Establishment Wiring

All wiring, apparatus, etc., not specifically covered by special rules herein given, must conform to the [standard rules and] general requirements of [the National Electrical] this Code, and the term "theater" shall mean a building, or that part of a building regularly or frequently used for dramatic, operatic, moving picture or other performances or shows or which has a stage for such performances used with scenery or other stage appliances.

Reels Containing Films Under Examination or in Process of Rewinding

Must be enclosed in magazines similar to those required for moving picture machines, or in other approved metal boxes.

We feel sure that our readers will agree with us that the above excerpts are of value to the trade at large, and will thank us for copying them for their perusal. To get the full value of the book they should have one in their possession, and this they can obtain free of cost by application to the Department.

THE Moving Picture News, which holds the front rank as the only absolutely Independent motion picture trade publication, is recognized as the exponent of all that is just and right, and now that the Independents have won all that could be desired and can work with free hands and without molestation by any faction seeking to control and monopolize the entire trade, it would advocate that the entire industry get together for the betterment of cinematography in general.

The convention of exhibitors recently held at Cleveland and the enthusiasm shown at that meeting strengthens our belief that for the best interests of the trade all differences should be forgotten and the bitter strife caused by patent litigation should cease. The public demand the best films and subjects that can be produced, and with a free mind to work with and their entire time concentrated on their labors—the Independent manufacturer should aim to produce subjects of a calibre that must command the approval and respect of the best minds. Cinematography is going forward with leaps and bounds and as an educational factor it is felt. Historical subjects, travel and scientific topics are desired. Good, clean comedy is essential, as our patrons must be amused and dull care driven away after the strenuous toil of the busy day. Get together—make yourself felt and you can rest assured that in the near future you will not be only in the Independent ranks, but the entire motion picture trade will be independent. There will be no Trust, as its members will be in the Independent ranks and as independent concerns, and not a monopoly.

TO WHOM ARE WE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE INFERIORITY OF LANTERN SLIDES USED TO ILLUSTRATE SONGS?

WE have heard recently a great many comments on the inferiority of the lantern slides used in the moving picture houses to illustrate songs. We ourselves have been present and commented inwardly, and have been at a loss to know the actual source of the trouble.

Not long ago a member of our staff obtained an interview with one of the largest lantern slide firms in the city. After a number of illustrations of most beautifully artistic work had been displayed before the eyes of the interviewer, in startlingly unpleasant contrast to the foregoing, appeared in hard, glaring colors, the slide which has been the bane of the patron of the moving picture house.

"Why is it that you use such vivid shades in these slides?" questioned the interviewer. "Why don't you use the artistic blending here that you have used in some of those you have just shown me?"

"Well, you see sometimes the operators employed are careless—some of them eighteen or twenty years old. They get the slides finger-marked, then don't take the trouble to clean them off, and throw the pictures on the screen from those bedaubed slides; the result would be that the delicate shading would be lost and we would be criticized for turning out inferior slides. And, besides, the public like these highly colored slides—that's what they want."

"How do you know that the public like them?" continued our friend. "How do you get your knowledge of what the public like?"

"Oh, we just gather it from the comments we hear among the audience."

"I know a great many people who do not care for these vividly colored slides; in fact, I have heard some very detrimental remarks concerning them, and I am satisfied the public do not like them," was the persistent rejoinder.

"Yes, but what class of people have you heard speak in this way?" was the confident question.

"Intelligent people, of course," was the reply.

"Ah, yes; but how many intelligent people do you find in a moving picture house? The intelligent class, as a rule, do not frequent them."

"Ah," replied our friend in rather a triumphant tone, "that may have been so some few years ago, but not so to-day. Why? Because the moving picture has been progressing; it has shed its immoralities and its indecencies, and has taken on more of the educational garb; it has become not only a clean entertainer, but an educator as well, therefore the most intelligent people in the land are to-day attracted to the moving picture theater."

A forced acquiescence was the result. The lantern slide people have evidently forgotten that the world is moving—to-day has been to them as yesterday. Wake up! lantern slide manufacturers. To-day the people are clamoring for the best that your art has to give them. Already the moving picture manufacturers have gained on you by more than half a length; to run a close second, as you should do, you will have to hustle. You must give us the class of illustrations we want, not what you think we want. The class of slides that have been illustrating songs are such as might delight the untamed savage in war paint and feathers, but not the intelligent audiences that frequent the moving picture theater of to-day.

THE MAN IN THE QUESTION

By Margaret I. MacDonald

NOW and again incidents occur which are peculiarly significant of the trend of present human development, incidents which stand out strong and promising against the recent crime wave which has been apparently enveloping our country; incidents which cause Hope to gaze more steadfastly toward her star. Just such an incident occurred when the moving picture exhibitors of New York City, this big, wicked metropolis, refused to utilize for commercial gain the notoriety of the unfortunate girl, Beulah Binford.

Beulah Binford is only one of the thousands of young girls who have been dragged down by the human animals roaming this earth. She is now but eighteen years old, just on the brink of womanhood. At fifteen the bud was seared by the worm—the freshness of the petals stolen away. The God-given passion of the girl was sapped away into a vacuum from whence its echo came back to her in empty, mocking tones. Her outlook upon life is naturally dismal and uncertain. She is confronted with a confusion of things—her horizon is distorted. This girl has arrived at one of the turning points in her life, shall she take the path to her right, or the path to her left?—the one leading upward or the one leading downward? Just such a point is arrived at in the lives of most of us at one time or another. I have a great deal of respect for the men who refused as a matter of principle to use the shattered life of this young girl for gain—as a bait for the vulgar mob. And I have the most profound respect and admiration for those men who interfered to the extent of bringing compulsion to bear upon the case, threatening a withdrawal of license consequent to a disregard of the wishes of the city authorities.

There are plenty of excellent themes on hand without resorting to repulsive murder cases such as the Beattie case, or of making more public the misfortune of a mere girl, let alone the impression placed not only on the mind of the girl herself by using her connection with a crime as a pedestal of prominence, but also the impression made on the minds of other young girls by giving them a perverted idea of the result of a disgrace and a notoriety brought about by association with crime.

Beulah Binford may be a "fool," as I have recently heard her spoken of by men, but I cannot think it is either kind or just to speak of a girl who is little more than a child in this way. We must not forget that there are wicked men waiting on every corner for every young girl that steps out of her home to the street. I am sorry indeed to have to make this statement, but it is nevertheless true. These men have often fascinating ways, and always a plausible reason why. The young girl is necessarily inexperienced, and it may be she has had inferior home-training, and either a betrayal is forced upon her, or she is lured away from the straight and narrow path by illusive promises. The disillusionment comes ere long and the young girl becomes either a hardened criminal without respect for her self or anyone else, or her nature becomes softened and broadened by the sad experience. But remember this, the softening and broadening effect comes about only through kindly, gentle, considerate treatment; by giving a helping hand and a word of hope and encouragement at the right time. This girl, as I understand, has come to New York to try to earn an honest living. It may be, I cannot truthfully say, that the motive which prompted the proposition to have Beulah Binford pose for moving pictures was a good one. That person may have had a perverted idea of giving a helping hand—it may have been done with the intention of uplifting, but whichever way it happened, I think we are all of one mind, that it was a much mistaken idea of kindness. No nobler mission could be given anyone than the privilege of being of use in a case of this kind. Get the girl something to do by all means, but let it be a modest, quiet, unobtrusive way of making a living. Provide her a healthy environment if you can—give her a chance to live a straight life. Make it possible for her to learn by actual experience that there is something more in life than lust and crime.

Putting aside the case of which we have been speaking, I want to say something about the position of the woman in New York. The position of a young woman in New York City is such that it is almost impossible for her to even ride on the elevated or subway trains without being annoyed by some depraved specimen of humanity in the shape of a man—mere animals in human form. If the authorities would but recognize it, there is a crying need for detectives to be distributed about the city to handle the situation as it should be handled. I have myself come in contact with situations on the trains, at the depots and on the streets which it would be impossible to put in print. That such a condition should exist in this enlightened age without some move being made to remedy it is a blot on civilization.

Not long ago a case was brought to my notice where the wolf in sheep's clothing happened to be a theatrical agent. A young lady of my acquaintance was seeking a position with an agent named "———," in the employ of a Mr. "———," a large theatrical manager. The young lady happened in the entry of the building where his office was, one day, not intending to call on him just then, when he came along. He had promised her a part in a certain play, and he wanted to talk to her about it. He asked her to come alone to his office—to shake the girl with whom she happened to be. When she refused he then asked her to come and have something to eat with him—and a drink. When she had refused this, saying that she did not drink, he said, "Don't you smoke then?" she answered "No." "Then what the devil do you do?" he sneered. Then after some more coaxing, with repeated refusals on her part to go to his office with him alone, he angrily told her that she might go where she wanted to, but she needn't come back to him again. This is how many, many young women go astray. This is why it is so hard to live a respectable, normal life in the theatrical business. It seems a pity that where art is concerned so many indecencies are committed, so much honor and virtue bought and sold. There is one thing with which I have been impressed in visiting the different studios where moving pictures are being posed for; there is no idling, no time for idle thought or dissipation, everyone is busy and there is so much of the time of the people spent out in God's good fresh air and sunshine, in the woods and in the fresh green meadows, and in Nature there is no incentive for lust; you are impressed only with the beauty of Nature and the greatness of the infinite. With Nature is the home of art.

Truly has it been said that "the greatest study of mankind is man." As I heard a friend say not long ago. "For every human individual that goes astray, some other individual has failed to accede to the requirements of Duty."

BEULAH BINFORD IN MOVING PICTURES

NEW YORK CITY, in addition to other cities in the country, has been the midst of a newspaper campaign against the exploiting of this lady in moving pictures, and on another page appears an article from the New York Evening World in which they claim full credit for the suppression of the girl from pictures. We feel it is only right and just to Nickelodia that this girl was debarred from appearing in any film, and take our readers into a little past history and also explain our position in the matter.

Four and a half years ago we strenuously opposed several of Pathe Freres' pictures being exhibited in the city, and got the then Mayor to use his influence to suppress them. We also, through the Associated Press, voiced our sentiments against these pictures. "The James Boys of Missouri" was another film which we got suppressed here, and used all influence that we had at our command in getting other cities to do the same. When our good friend. S. Lubin, of Philadelphia, got out the Thaw-White film, we immediately put the machinery under Mayor McClellan in operation and got that suppressed, using the machinery of the Associated Press to stir up the country to suppress such films which we believed to be absolutely detrimental to the advancement of cinematography.

Thursday, September 7th, we received a telegram from Chesterfield to the effect that a gentleman had taken Beulah Binford to New York to pose in moving pictures. We immediately tried to find out who he was. We could not associate him for the moment. Not waiting to know whether it was friend or foe, we incidentally learned that it was some Independent firm that was using the girl, and called the attention of the Mayor and Press to the fact that she was being exploited. The action of the Mayor through the Chief of the License Bureau, Mr. Wallace, is now well known.

We understand the company has produced a wonderfully clever picture—a magnificently staged production—and no less a person than the Rev. Madison C. Peters has expressed full and complete approval, stating there is nothing objectionable but only the very highest truths are told in the story. His remarks are found in another column. It is rather unfortunate that someone other than the girl herself could not be used for this picture because of the notoriety and the character of the Beattie case. It will not elevate the industry, and other means might have been obtained to spread the truth. Further than this, the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures, Tuesday, September 12th, condemned the motion pictures in which Beulah Binford posed, and the board has informed its correspondents throughout the country films showing this woman have been ordered suppressed by the board. The board holds the pictures appeal only to morbid curiosity and teach nothing. We fully agree with the board, and in the interests of every exhibitor we ask them to tell us if our action on their behalf and the good of cinematography has their approval.

MOVING PICTURES AND THEIR AUDIENCES

By A. L. Barrett

THE five million people who comprise the daily moving picture audience of the United States are drawn from every age, rank and condition, notwithstanding the favorite and very common sneer made by those unacquainted with very evident facts, that they can only satisfy the ignorant and poorer classes because of their extreme simplicity and cheapness of admission. If these sneerers would take the trouble to observe for ten minutes the persons entering a moving picture house in any neighborhood, they would find sufficient evidence to refute such a statement, for although, fortunately, thousands of the very poorest and ignorant people can and do attend them, yet they possess an almost equal attraction for those more fortunately circumstanced, and near the large theaters where picture plays are presented will be found lines of carriages and automobiles, the occupants being women and men well known in the religious, educational and social world, who represent both the wealth and brains of the nation, and to whom neither cheapness nor mediocrity could possibly appeal. Such audiences do not find this once despised "poor man's amusement" beneath them; in fact, they can better appreciate the scientific research that originated the amusement as well as the picture plays themselves, particularly the educational films or travelogues representing scenes with which many of them are already familiar. With the advent of kinemacolor, this pleasure will be greatly enhanced and those who have traveled abroad will again be able to see the favorite spots in England, France Italy, Switzerland, Germany and other countries which they remember so well, not merely in a book of colored views only, or on a black and white moving picture, but in actual vivid colors or the neutral tints that have been wrought by time.

Picture plays as at present conducted are attracting favorable comment on all sides and in the audiences are found clergymen, members of college faculties, students, philosophers, lawyers—men and women—the brains of the nation. In the minds of the wealthy, there is always an unthinking prejudice against that which is patronized largely by the poorer classes, and if the leaders of the moving picture industry had been satisfied with mediocrity in their production, they would have had a corresponding quality in their audience, but the strenuous insistence for the best has been rewarded by a steady improvement in the audience, until now people are willing to pay as much as seventy-five cents for a good seat at the best moving picture plays, and the patrons are drawn from the highest ranks. In England, for instance, we hear that the Prince of Wales, with other members of the Royal family, have greatly enjoyed the picture plays representing themselves as they appeared in various Coronation functions, and in ordering that Messrs. Urban and Smith be given every possible facility for securing a first-class reproduction, King George has given a great impetus to the moving picture trade and brought it before the favorable notice of thousands of people who would never, possibly, have entered a picture play theater had it not been for these particular films and who leave the theaters both wiser and happier than when they entered, for they no longer have the foolish and unreasonable prejudices with which they entered the building. Royalty does not consider this despised "poor man's amusement" beneath its notice for the simple season that it appeals to all classes, from the highest to the lowest, to the educated as well as to the ignorant.

To drop from royal favor and seventy-five-cent seats to the five-cent open air shows in a vacant lot where the films are but second-rate, we see even here whatever refinement and culture a neighborhood posssses as well as the poorer people. There will be seen the local physicians and trades people taking an hour's amusement when the opportunity offers, the tired mother who at last has an hour she can call her own, and although still attended by a couple of her numerous brood, can enter heartily into the troubles of a cruelly persecuted pair of lovers, and when no one is looking, can enjoy a comfortable weep over the "Schoolmaster's Overcoat," can laugh the next minute at the adventures of Mutt and Jeff, and then, as she came in during the middle of a set of pictures, can enjoy a chat while one of the touchingly beautiful illustrated songs is being rendered by some local Scotti or Bispham endowed with lungs warranted to last under the strongest pressure, and when this performance is over, is ready for one of the beautiful travelogues, or a pictorial description of railroad building in the West. The moving picture show is also a favorite rendezvous for groups of young people where they can remain in the open air, and thousands of boys seem to find more pleasure and profit in investing five cents for one of the performances than the same amount in a drink at the saloon with the privilege of kicking their heels on the sidewalk when their nickel is gone. It is a favorite place for the workingmen also, who like the open air performances, where they can usually enjoy a quiet smoke, and there is no necessity, moreover—so distasteful to a tired man—of specially dressing for an hour or so's entertainment.

At the majority of performances, the rate of admission is the same for all seats, and every occupation, class and condition will be found represented, yet we rarely hear of friction. The physician may frequently find himself next to a laborer, the refined and educated woman next to her own washlady, the college student in close proximity to what would elsewhere be termed a "gallery god," but all, the last mentioned included, conduct themselves quietly. In the picture play performance there is the same excitement, the same crucial moments, the same recognition of some favorate actor to be found in the ordinary theater, but—there is not the same noise or disturbance that the gallery always evidences, to the annoyance of the rest of the audience. The picture play audiences are, generally speaking, a quiet, orderly crowd in which women and children can mingle without fear of annoyance, except on very rare occasions, now becoming rarer every day. This was not always the case, it must be admitted; there have been many instances where some well-known objectionable characters in a neighborhood have deliberately set out to annoy or insult persons frequenting moving pictures, and have succeeded admirably until caught.

This could, however, be entirely prevented if "spotters" were employed, and if, when there was apparently no reason for it, the lights were suddenly turned on. With the exceptions that prove the rule, a moving picture audience will be found to be orderly, quiet and composed of both the brain and brawn of the nation. It is a perfectly respectable, innocent form of amusement where mothers and daughters can go unattended, parents can take their children, and working persons can go to spend a pleasant couple of hours without the necessity of an entire change of apparel, or expending at least thirty-five cents for a very poor seat, with the knowledge that they are looked on as the poor part of an audience; and besides this, they return home at a reasonable hour and are fit for their work the next morning. Since the managers have manifested greater interest in the care of their audiences as well as the films presented, parents have placed more confidence in them and we now frequently see groups of carefully brought up young girls going unescorted to the picture plays, and comparatively few people have the slightest fear in allowing their older children to go there unattended. This managerial watchfulness should continue unabated as the plays often appeal to young people particularly and convey such wholesome morals that they make the best teachers, besides infusing, as they do so frequently, some bit of information, suggesting some historical epoch, showing some industry or exemplifying some religious truth.

What has happened to the gallery god? Thousands of his kind have deserted the theater (except where a picture show is to be given between the acts) and has transferred his allegiance to the picture play, yet we never hear that rough, uncouth young man evidencing his enjoyment in noisy mirth, yelling, stamping and making himself generally objectionable in the manner invariably heard at the theater galleries, yet his interest is as keen, the same pathetic scenes are enacted, the dramatic situations are as intense, the comic element just as pronounced, and he attends the picture play in just as large numbers. What occult influence has wrought this change? At the theaters, he is a rowdy; at the picture play performances, he is a gentleman. Do the moving pictures, in addition to their other virtues, give lessons in etiquette in combination with a pleasant evening's entertainment? The leaders of the industry have never mentioned such intention, but does not true modesty "love to do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame?"

MR. H. BLACHE

We were very agreeably surprised on Tuesday, the 12th, to receive a visit from Mr. Blache, who had just arrived in New York on the steamer Kronprinzessin Cecilia instead of the slower route which would have brought him here on the 16th. He informed us that business abroad is extremely good and that in a little while some good developments will mature relating to the Gaumont chronophone.

Mr. Blache looks hearty and robust, and the vacation combining both business with pleasure certainly agreed with Mr. and Mrs. Blache, who have come back with renewed vigor to take charge of the Gaumont and the Solax interests respectively.

We tried to draw Mr. Blache out to give a more detailed statement, but he said that having only just come off board, he felt it would require a little longer time to prepare an interview, but that we may say the Solax Company will be all the better for the fresh ideas that Mrs. Blache, the proprietress, brings back with her from Paris and that these ideas will show in immediate releases.

THE YANKEE FILM COMPANY

For the first time in the history of moving pictures, an entire newspaper plant from the editorial department to the press room has been utilized to add realism to a picture. The composing room, press room, as well as the editorial and reportorial room, play an important part in "The Star Reporter," issued by the Yankee Film Company on September 18th.

For this story the entire front page of a newspaper called "The Star" was published.

"DAVID COPPERFIELD" SCHEDULED

It is now definitely announced by the Thanhouser Company that the first of their big Dickens' productions is to be released on October 17th. This is entitled "The Early Life of David Copperfield." It is a complete reel of the early but eventful career of Charles Dickens' famous character, the story finishing as if the reel has no connection with any other. But two other reels, each as complete in itself as the first, will be released on consecutive Tuesdays. Thus, while each reel is a magnificent release in itself, when shown together, they form the entire history of David Copperfield.

"THE ROSE AND THE DAGGER"

RELEASED THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21

A plain title, like the truth we are telling about it. A woman who finds herself in the power of a bandit flirts and dances to divert his mind and obtain possession of his dagger. If your reason isn't rocky, you'll speak up! This is frank fact, not mere blabber.

"The Rose and the Dagger" is a three-bagger for speed and strength. We sincerely advise you to get it!

MOVING PICTURE FILMS TO REPLACE ALBUMS

Spokane Man Declares Future Families Will Have Galleries —Make Historic Record—Animated Photographs Will Be Used in Public Events, He Predicts

(Special Dispatch to The North American)

Spokane, Wash., Sept. 2.—Moving picture films will replace the family album and old-fashioned portraits in the homes of the well-to-do in the near future, according to Edward McConahey, of Spokane, pioneer of the animated photograph art in the Pacific northwest.

"These domesticated moving pictures," he added, "will be made with all the care now devoted to gallery photographs and will include every member of the family, from the grandfather to the newest comer into the home.

"There is no way of estimating the pleasure it would give children to see their parents as they looked when boys and girls, and later as young men and women, before the responsibilities of life had checked their exuberant and youthful spirits."

Mr. McConahey, who has devoted much time to the subject since 1896, said when asked how the idea came to him:

"One day while showing views of the late King Edward and Queen Alexandra, picturing them walking together in the garden at Sandringham, I thought why not have such reproductions of people less highly placed? Why not have them for the people? The idea has been with me constantly since then.

"I feel confident that within a few years the moving picture portrait gallery will be installed in every family that can afford it. I think, too, that in the near future when a cornerstone is laid for a public building a film of the entire proceedings will be placed in the hollow, so that when the building is removed succeeding generations may know what the men and women looked like who took part in the ceremonial. This would be of direct historic interest to every community."

EXHIBITORS! LOOK OUT FOR A SURPRISE FROM THE YANKEE

There will shortly be a surprise packet from the Yankee Film Company for exhibitors who handle Yankee films. Flags are flying, guns are booming—look out for the salute!

BERT ADLER RECOVERING

The many friends and acquaintances of Mr. Bert Adler, of the Thanhouser Company, will be glad to know of his rapid strides toward recovery from the slight attack of typhoid with which he was recently stricken. His physicians have stated that there will be no crisis, but that before the three-week limit is arrived at he will doubtless be out and about.

Mr. H. A. Spanuth, of the Sales Company, has been out of town on vacation for the past week. He is expected to return about the first or middle of the coming week.

Tarentum, Pa.—The Consolidated Picture Company is making an effort to establish a new picture theater here.

Milwaukee, Wis.—The Bell Theater will erect a new house at Fourteenth street and North avenue.

Milwaukee, Wis.—The Atlas Amusement Company has awarded the contract for the erection of a new picture showhouse at Twentieth and Fond Du Lac avenue to the Phoenix-Ferro Company.

UNCLE PETE'S RUSE

A tale of the South during the Civil War entitled "Uncle Pete's Ruse," will be released by the Imp Company, Monday, October 16th. In this story the ready thought and tact of an old negro servant is made the theme and the plot is original with the author. The director has grasped the situation and made the most of the manuscript. The negro characters are true to life and there is a vein of humor running through the story that is refreshing in the way of being unique. An officer in the Confederate army steals his way through the picket lines of the Union forces to visit his young wife. While there the house is surrounded by a hostile force and he is in imminent danger of being captured. Uncle Pete, a faithful servitor, is the only cool one in the house and he sets about to circumvent the Yankees. By a clever ruse he induces the Union squad to officiate at the mock funeral of his master, who subsequently makes his escape unharmed. The Federals have an inkling that they have been the victims of a hoax, return and unearth the casket filled with junk, and their worst fears are realized. It is needless to say that the old colored man is delighted at the result of his efforts to have his master and mistress appreciates his cunning. The story is carefully staged and acted in an admirable manner.

BINFORD GIRL SHOW IN MOVING PICTURES BARRED BY GAYNOR

The sordid and shameful life of seventeen-year-old Beulah Binford, whose association with Henry C. Beattie, Jr., was made known to the public in the course of his trial at Chesterfield, Va., for the murder of his wife, will not be exhibited for profit to New York audiences, whether in pictures or by the appearance of the girl on the stage in any part of the greater city.

After a consultation with Mayor Gaynor, just before his departure for the State Fair at Syracuse this afternoon, James G. Wallace, Commissioner of Licenses, sent the following letter to Isaac Levi, president of the company under whose management the Binford girl has been posing before moving picture cameras on Staten Island since her arrival in this city:

New York, Sept. 11, 1911.

Levi Company, Incorporated, 1560 Broadway.

Sir: I beg to inform you that any moving picture films or stereopticon views relating to the Beattie murder case, depicting any scene in connection therewith, or featuring any persons implicated therein, or who are depending for advertising on their connection with this gruesome tragedy, are condemned for the reason that they are unfit to be shown in places of public amusement.

I hereby notify you that these films or pictures must under no circumstances be exhibited in your moving picture show or shows, under penalty of suspension or revocation of your license or licenses.

Respectfully,
JAMES G. WALLACE.
Chief, Bureau of Licenses.

This action of Mr. Wallace lines New York up with the score or more of other cities which responded to The Evening World's appeal to public sentiment to prevent the exploitation in moving picture theaters or before the footlights of the miserable example of the girl, who after she was repudiated by Beattie on the witness stand, had no hesitation in telling of her association with him, which began when she was thirteen years old.

In his application Levi said that the pictures of the woman whose notoriety came out of her friendship with Henry Clay Beattie, Jr., convicted of wife murder at Chesterfield Court House, Virginia, last week, were intended to carry a "moral lesson" and a warning to other young girls to shun the temptation such as that to which she succumbed.

After the Mayor had gone Mr. Wallace gave out word that he would inform Levi, presumably at the Mayor's direction, that no license would be given for the display of the pictures anywhere in Greater New York and they must not be exhibited, no matter whether the intent was to convey a moral lesson or not.

The Mayor had a hurried conference with Police Commissioner Rhinelander Waldo after Mr. Wallace left him and it is understood that he instructed Mr. Waldo not to permit Beulah Binford to appear on any stage in this city in person or as a figure in pictures.

Detroit Bars Beulah Binford

Detroit, Mich., Sept. 11.—Beulah Binford, the "other woman" in the Beattie murder case, will not be allowed to appear on the vaudeville stage here, according to the managers of the chief vaudeville theaters. "To book such an act would be an insult to our patrons," is the explanation given to-day in each case.—New York World, Sept. 11, 1911.

New York, Sept. 11, 1911.

A. H. Saunders, Esq.
Editor, Moving Picture News,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

At some early opportunity will you kindly let me know if you approve, or if the educational or religious public approve, of the picture play performance of "Dante's Inferno?" I really cannot say that I do, but believe it will undo all the good that has been wrought to the trade by the Kinemacolor Coronation films. Personally, I think it is the most abominable production. There has always been some trouble made concerning theatrical productions which brought in pictures of hell and do not you think that this feeling will be intensified when the moving pictures take it up? As it is, they are blamed for about all the wickedness that goes on at the present moment.

Yours truly,

B. L. A.

A CLEVER PIECE OF WORK FROM THE "YANKEE"

One of the cleverest and smoothest pieces of work among next week's releases will be a film done by the "Yankee." Its title is "The Star Reporter." It is a remarkably clever newspaper story, gotten up for the occasion, well constructed and full of interest. The piece is well cast, and the abandon with which the players have thrown themselves into their work is very evident in the magnetism which the picture possesses. There is nothing more disastrous to the success of a moving picture than a lack of abandonment on the part of the actors and actresses who have participated in the production of the picture. The work of the company in this production seems to be perfect as regards the dovetailing—they have worked in splendid unison, and have, therefore, produced the desired effect of holding the interest of the onlooker.

The story runs htsi: A sergeant of the Army, stationed in the Philippines, is entrusted with a stolen casket of jewels, with a promise of sharing in the profit. After they have been in his keeping for a short time he decides to betray the man who has stolen the jewels, but at the same time keep them himself. He sends his men out to hunt the thief. The thief escapes them, only to turn up at a most inopportune moment, after the officer has had his discharge and is living quietly in New York, nerves shattered from a guilty conscience, together with the ravages of a deadly Filipino drug with which he constantly doped himself. He receives a message from the man from whom he has stolen the jewels to come to a certain saloon to meet him, with a threat that he will get him whether he comes or not. The officer disregards the threat and the man appears in his room just as he is about to take a potion of his favorite drug. He dies of heart failure on the spot. His nephew, who comes in shortly afterward, and who also gives the alarm, is accused of murder. It is at this point that the clever work of the "Star Reporter" comes in, where she finds finger prints on the window, and a piece of a man's check shirt on the shrubbery beneath the window; where she finds the note, and goes dressed in male garments to the saloon where the man is to be, and discovers him with the identical piece torn out of his shirt. It is a clever piece of detective work, and the evidence which she gathers and at once reports to the newpaper results in freeing the nephew of the dead man.

A unique part of the picture is the scene in the newspaper plant where the "extra" is being printed. This portion of the picture is educative, as it is a genuine illustration of the working of the printing press—in fact, of the news column in its different stages of development.

This film will be released Monday, September 18.

WRESTLING PICTURES

The Gotch-Hackenschmidt match will be fought all over again in the moving picture theaters. This match caused widespread interest and left Gotch the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world.

The match was full of action and Hackenschmidt proved one of the few men that was able to get behind Gotch, and only for the wonderful speed of the latter a different decision might have resulted.

Thirty-five thousand persons witnessed the match at White Sox Comiskey baseball park. A great feature of the picture is the spectators themselves, Thousands of women, some of them leading society ladies of Chicago, are occupants of the boxes. Not one objectionable feature can be detected among the vast throng. Nearly every face of all the prominent box and seat holders can easily be distinguished—so plain and faithful was the work of the moving picture camera. Mr. William Selig, of the Selig Polyscope Company, who took the pictures for the Gotch-Hackenschmidt Picture Company, feels particularly proud of the result and success of this film, but admits that it took him many years, and now for the first time he feels satisfied that an absolutely clear and perfect picture can be boasted of.

Hackenschmidt and Gotch are seen entering the ring from opposite directions surrounded by their seconds and friends; both are smiling and brimful of confidence as they enter the ring. Several introductions of notables follow; among them "Battling" Nelson, "Packey" McFarland, several high-class mat artists, and a distinguished English sportsman, the Marquis of Queensberry. Hack and Gotch are then seen to pose for the cameras of newspaper men, and so realistic is the film that one can almost hear the click of the kodaks. The timekeepers, Otto Floto for Hackenschmidt, Senator P. J. Carroll, the sponsor of the Illinois Boxing Bill, for Gotch, and Walter Eckersall, the famous football star, the Empire Club's official timekeeper, are then introduced.

Referee Ed W. Smith calls the men to the center for one final instruction and an interpretation of his rules, and then the great match is on.

For several minutes the struggle is that of the lion and the tiger. Soon the men are locked in deadly holds and by sheer strength they part. The crowd rises to cheer the foreign invader as Hackenschmidt jumps behind Gotch. This in itself is a tribute to American sportsmanship and fair play. The crowd knows no sectional favorite and they go wild for the few seconds that Hackenschmidt has the advantage. By some clever maneuver, Gotch breaks loose and Hackenschmidt is thrown heavily to the ground, but in a few seconds tears away and is up once more. Again they lock grips and the contest is once more fierce. So it continues until at the end of fourteen minutes and some odd seconds Gotch secures a crotch and half-Nelson hold which results in Referee Ed Smith tapping him on the back and announcing him winner of the first fall.

One can hardly believe that so much skill and wrestling ability could be shown by any contestant in such a short time. One thing is sure; all those who witnessed the match will want to view the pictures.

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF MILWAUKEE

Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 2, 1911.

Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Friend: At a meeting held by the Exhibitors' League of Milwaukee on August 9th, it was decided to form a state organization of exhibitors as suggested by the National Exhibitors Association, at the National Convention held in Cleveland, Ohio, August 1, 2, 3. The purpose of this meeting will be to get the exhibitors in closer touch with each other for the mutual benefit of every exhibitor in the state and union. It is our intention to have a convention on September 19-20, at Milwaukee, at which time matters will be discussed as might be brought up by the different exhibitors and form a permanent organization.

The first day, ten o'clock in the morning, there will be a business meeting which will be continued in the afternoon at two o'clock. The second day the exhibitors will be entertained by the members of the Exhibitors' League of Milwaukee.

In order that we may make reservation for you, please answer by return mail whether or not you intend to be present.

The National Exhibitors' Association allows only one state organization, and it is our desire to form a state organization which we can be proud of.

Thanking you in advance for any efforts you may take in carrying out our wishes we wish to remain,

Very truly yours,
EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF MILWAUKEE,
Per Benj. N. Judell, Secretary.

Back of the YANKEE trade mark are the combined efforts of a splendid organization of Moving Picture experts second to none.

CENSORS FORBID MOTION PICTURES OF BINFORD GIRL

After viewing the motion pictures of Beulah Binford yesterday and meeting the young woman, the members of the National Board of Censors who had gone to the studio voted against endorsing the exhibition. L. J. Rubinstein, who is managing the Binford pictures, declares he will fight the decision as unjust and formed before the censors saw the films.

Mr. Rubinstein says that he will appeal to Mayor Gaynor to see that justice is done the young woman. He asserts she is being robbed of the only chance she has to lead an honest life and that it is false to say the pictures are based upon vicious incidents or bring out the details of the Beattie tragedy.

Rubinstein brought about a meeting between his charge —for he has assumed the guardianship of Beulah Binford, whom he has taken into his own home—and several ministers yesterday. To them she told her story, and afterward they saw the films. One of them, the Rev. Dr. Madison C. Peters, said.

"I see nothing in the pictures that should cause their suppression. They are like 'The Old Homestead' or 'Way Down East' in certain things. And as for Beulah Binford, instead of the case-hardened woman of the world, I found a slip of a girl who never has had a chance.

"The girl should have a helping hand extended to her. It is a blot upon Christian ministry and Christian brotherhood that for forty-five days, since her story first became public, she has received no offers of aid or sympathy.

"She has never had a mother's care and surely she should not be held responsible for the missteps taken when she was thirteen years old. As a matter of fact, her story, instead of being one to damn her, is a rebuke and an indictment against a society that enables such things to be."

The pictures are based upon the story of Beulah Binford's life. They show her as a baby left to the care of her grandmother while her mother devotes her time to playing the races. Then comes a series of films showing a tomboy stage and then the time when she is induced to take automobile rides with, presumably, Henry Clay Beattie. Another picture, following, shows her, tear-stained and weary. It is labelled "Realization." Then follows several that show how she left Richmond and sought work in department stores and restaurants, only to be persecuted with attentions.

The last pictures portray her with Beattie on the night before the murder of the latter's wife and then the "third degree" that she is given by the detectives to discover if she has knowledge of the shooting. She is shown in the prison where she was held. By way of teaching the "moral lesson" that the promoters talk about, this is called the "Wages of Sin."

The censors made the following statement.

"The Board of Censorship has carefully viewed and discussed the Beulah Binford motion picture. The picture is condemned because of the feeling that the sole and only appeal is directed to morbid curiosity, this being true regardless of the merits and demerits of the actual picture. The picture intrinsically fails to teach any lesson except one of sentimental toleration for the girl who takes easy opportunities to 'go wrong.'

"We consider that the picture, although containing no positively indecent scene, would have a demoralizing tendency even if it were not known as the Binford picture. When to this fact is added the present notoriety of Miss Binford and the way in which the picture would be advertised, it seems to this board that the interests of the public and the interests of the motion picture business demand the suppression of the film."—N. Y. World, Sept. 13.

A COMEDY FILM SUBJECT

Monkey Wanders from Home and Gets Into Wrong Pew

If anyone in Dallas doesn't know the meaning of the old expression, "more fun than a barrel of monkeys," he would have been enlightened had he been down to Little Jake's cleaning and dyeing establishment on North Akard street near Pacific avenue, the other afternoon.

A wild monkey from Copley's jungleland came in the alleyway, mounted to the transom window and took a flying swing for one of the wires that holds up the pole on which Jake hangs his customers' clothes.

The pole broke. The clothes fell to the floor as the monkey took a flying leap to a similar pole on the other side of the room.

Someone started the cry that there was a $5 reward for the capture of the monkey. Hundreds gathered. A policeman says, "That monkey knows me, I saw him at Fair Park."

The monkey came for him with wide opened mouth. When the cop saw his teeth he retreated, saying "I was mistaken—the monkey doesn't know me."

One man more daring than the others seized the monkey by the tail—he thought monkeys didn't have teeth at that end. He was mistaken for the monkey put his teeth clear through his thumb.

As the crowd stood upon the pressing tables crying everything from "murder" to "fire" a farmer walked in with a laprobe. He threw it over the monkey's head; the monkey by his antics wrapped himself in the covering and the fun was over.

In the meantime someone stole two pairs of trousers from Little Jake and now he has a bill of damages against Copley.

DALY'S THEATER

Opening Monday matinee, the Kinemacolor Company will move from the Herald Square, where they have been enjoying a phenomenal run, to this theater. To commemorate the change of quarters, they will put in an entire change of program, opening with "From Bud to Blossom," a floral picture and the most scientific botanical picture ever produced. They will show an entire new series of Coronation views, taking in the best known quarters in London, including the King and Queen leaving Buckingham Palace on Coronation Day; the Royal progress over London Bridge; the greatest naval review ever taken entitled "Watch Dogs of the World," and will continue to show the Richmond Horse Show in which Judge Harmon Moore, of Chicago, and Mr. A. G. Vanderbilt, of New York, held up the honors of America so nobly.

MAJESTIC THEATER, NEW YORK

The Majestic Theater has been taken over by the Kinemacolor Company, who will exhibit their famous Kinemacolor series of Coronation pictures of scientific and other subjects for the four weeks following the opening Monday matinee, which was held on Labor Day.

This show will be distinctly different from the Kinemacolor show now at Daly's Theater. While a number of Coronation views will be shown, they will be of a different nature to those now being shown at the lower Broadway theater.

In addition to the Coronation views, a remarkable picture of the London Zoo will be shown and a picture of North Wales near Carnarvon Castle, the scene of the investiture of the Prince of Wales.

Another startling picture will be the Coronation Derby, run at the famous Epsom Downs, showing Danny Maher, America and England's premier jockey, rounding the famous Tattenham Corner, made famous in so many of England's Blue Ribbon events.

Mexia, Tex.—The Citizens Opera House Company has been organized here with W. L. Murphy as president and will erect a $25,000 opera house.

THE HOME OF THE NESTOR FILM

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

AT Mariners Harbor, Staten Island, there stands facing one of the quiet streets of the quiet little town, a white painted frame church building, bordered on either side by other edifices of various kinds and colors. This particular building has no marked characteristic save that it is a quaint, old-fashioned, gable-roofed structure, from which many a steadfast prayer has arisen to the Almighty in the days gone past. Having outlived its usefulness for the purpose of worship, or failing to keep pace with the fastidious tastes of the progressive worshipers, in the way of architectural beauty and artistic decoration, a new avenue of usefulness opened up for the plain-faced temple, and to-day if you take the trouble to visit Mariners Harbor you will find its in'ards a busy whirl of life. The pews and the altar have disappeared, and in their place have come the different departments of a moving picture studio; this is the present home of the Nestor film.

DAVID HORSLEY

There is a "homey" atmosphere about the Nestor Film Co.'s studio. We arrived there just at the lunch hour, when the dining tables were lined with hungry actors. As I leaned forward for a sly peep at the occupants of the dining-room my eye was caught by the back of a cowpuncher, made ferocious by the pistol which glared at me from its resting place in his belt. It was soon to be my turn to eat, I was informed, and when that time did arrive I found myself doing justice to a plate of vegetable soup such as I have never found in a New York restaurant either as regards quantity or quality.

Out back of the building is the open air studio, where I watched with great interest the rehearsing and taking of a couple of scenes. These scenes were rehearsed by Mr. Thomas Ricketts, director of comedy and special releases. Mr. Ricketts is a remarkable man, not only as regards his work, but as regards his wonderful energy for a man who, according to customary phraseology, is past his prime; but so remarkable is his energy that it is hard to realize that he has turned forty, save for the snow white hair which peeps from beneath the jaunty gray cap. "I am like old wine that grows better for its keeping," said Mr. Ricketts, in reply to a comment on his energetic bearing. "The last time I saw my father he was eighty-six years old, and he was younger than I was then," said he, and he shook his head and laughed as he continued: "Sometimes, when I go to bed at night, and I say to myself, 'I guess I'm finished—I guess this is my last picture,' and by golly! I get up in the morning as bright as I ever was, and I hustle around, and I say to the boys, 'Come on, now, boys, let's get to work,' and so it goes." Mr. Ricketts has been only a short time with the Nestor, having come to them from the Essanay Co., of Chicago. He was for twenty years leading actor with leading companies of his time, playing every line of character in stage vocabulary, from Shakespeare to low comedy, burlesque and comic opera. He was also stage director and producer for Charles Frohman, Klaw and Erlanger, F. C. Whitney, Shuberts, and all the leading managers of to-day. A number of special releases are being prepared by him, none of which have been released as yet.

The Nestor seems characterized by the unique class of individuals which it has in its employ. As the originals of "Mutt and Jeff" approached me I nearly screamed aloud with laughter, so unique and typical is their appearance, and such a startling contrast are they one to the other. Mr. David Horsley, founder and owner of the Nestor Film Co., is an Englishman of a high order of intelligence, and most charming in manner. Mr. Horsley tells some interesting tales of his pioneer experience, for he was, indeed, the pioneer of the Independents. When Mr. Horsley started his business he was alone in the field against the Trust. Said he, "I made my own camera, and my first picture while it was the best of the Independents, because it was the only one, was pretty bad at that. I took it down to the exchange to have it run off, and when the man came out I said to him, 'Well, how is it?' and said he, 'Ah, it's jumpin' all over.'"

It is interesting to know the origin of the name "Nestor." The first name of the now Nestor Film was "Centaur." Through some disagreement with the Union Trades Shipping Co. it became necessary to change it. Mr. Horsley had a partner whose name was Gorman. In the discussion of a new name Mr. Horsley one day surprised his partner by telling him that the new name should be "Nestor." "Why so?" queried the partner. "Well," continued Mr. Horsley, "a centaur was half man and half horse, wasn't it?" "Yes," came the answer. "Very well, then, your name has a 'man' in it and mine has a 'horse.' King Nestor of mythological fame fought the centaurs and defeated them, therefore, I think Nestor would be a very appropriate name for our company." Thereby hangs the tale of the re-christening of the Centaur Film Co. to the Nestor.

The Nestor Film Co. has three stage directors, each with his own distinct company, Mr. Milton H. Fahrney, Western director; Mr. Alfred E. Christie, director of the "Mutt and Jeff" series, under Mr. Horsley, and who, unfortunately, was ill on the day of my visit there, and Mr. Thomas Ricketts, of whom we have already spoken, and who, by the way, is preparing a special series of "Desperate Desmond" stuff, which promises to be very fine.

Nor must I forget the worthy camera men of the Nestor company, whose services are so necessary, and whose work can make or mar a production. Mr. Walter Pritchard, only twenty-one, taken from the factory by Mr. Horsley and placed at the camera to fill a suddenly created gap, has, I understand, gone ahead with leaps and bounds as a camera man, having turned out some very excellent work. He takes care of the Western work. Mr. John Nickolaus, of wide experience, takes care of the "Mutt and Jeff" series. Mr. Nickolause was for some time with the Wheeler Lantern Slide Co., and it is said that he practically made that company what it is, with his skillful and conscientious work.

"ACROSS THE DIVIDE"
Nestor Release of Sept. 20

The scenic artist of the Nestor Film Co. is Mr. Joseph Woods. Mr. Woods was for fourteen months with the Vitagraph Co., and has been with the "Nestor" since December last. Mr. Woods' work has spoken for itself in the pictures of both companies which have been before the public.

In the kitchen of the Nestor Co. is a very capable woman, Mrs. Hertzog by name, who not only does the cooking for sometimes over a hundred people, but also fills in in the pictures when it is necessary.

After a pleasant afternoon spent at the studio, we hied us in the huge "Nestor" touring car to the seat of the new plant at Bayonne. On our way there we stopped at the old plant, which is also at Bayonne, and which is in charge of Mr. William Horsley, of whom Mr. David Horsley said: "My brother does the work, and I get the credit." It was there that the exasperating clothesline of the family next door was pointed out to me; the clothesline which had formed the unfortunate habit of always flaunting its wash in the breeze on the very day and hour when an important picture scene was to be taken. "I gave the two girls of the house a dollar apiece to take in the clothes," said Mr. Horsley, "and one day when they saw us getting ready for a picture and had forgotten to take in the clothes, they thrust their heads out the window, grabbed frantically at the clothes and commenced pulling them in at the identical moment when the picture was being taken—you can imagine the rest." In this plant they had just completed a device whereby the washing of the film was done by spraying, instead of rinsing in a tank. In the projecting room, in the basement, we were shown that very excellent film of Mr. Fahrney's, "Across the Divide."

When at last we arrived at the seat of the new plant we found the ground dug out, almost ready for the commencement of the foundation work. This plant will be a structure of two and three stories, covering a space of ground 30 x 90. It will be fully equipped with all modern equipments, and will be capable of turning out 50.000 feet of film a day should the time come when the demand for moving pictures will warrant the turning out of such a quantity. At the present time the "Nestors" are turning out in the neighborhood of 20,000 feet per day. The new Nestor plant will be built at a cost of about $25,000. There has already been built just adjoining the spot where will stand the plant proper, an office and a garage. The office, to which they have only just moved from their former quarters in the German Bank building on Fourth avenue, is a pleasant, sunny room overlooking the water on one side, and the town on another.

Another interesting member of the firm of Nestor is Mr. Chas. Simone, who has charge of the publicity department. Mr. Simone, who acted as my escort from New York to the studio, kept me thoroughly entertained with many interesting and amusing stories of his early journey from Italy here —his arrival in the big city, and other subjects of interest. I felt exceedingly grateful for his kindness and courtesy in giving up almost his entire day for my entertainment and edification, thereby causing himself much inconvenience in having to work overtime the following day in order to catch up with business.

The director's life at a moving picture studio is a hard one. It means constant work—sometimes day and night, as many of them write a number of their own scenarios. As Mr. Fahrney, the Western director, said: "We have to give ourselves heart and body and soul to our work, in order to make it a success. We have no time left for family or anything else. Just how hard we do work no one knows but ourselves and God—and still I am fascinated by the work. It was so the first day I entered a studio—I felt I never wanted to leave it again."

"Sometimes I want to say nasty things," he continued, "but I just don't do it. The actor is in most cases trying to do his best, and if you get out of patience and lose your temper, it only makes him self-conscious, and you don't get good results."

Mr. Fahrney is a man who has done many things. When almost a lad he "soldiered" in Western Canada, was with Broadwater McColough & Co., cattle kings of the West, in Assiniboia, serving in the capacity of a cowpuncher. In China and Japan he served for the American Government in connection with the topography department. In addition to having acted as manager in the following theaters: Garrick, Chicago; Pike, Cincinnati; the Salt Lake City Stock; Stock in Denver; he was on the road with Louis James, and James O'Neil, and managed, besides, a company of his own through the West.

I feel that I cannot leave the subject of the Nestor Film Co. without a word about Mr. Russell Bassett, the oldest member of the Nestor Company. As I watched with interest the old man at his work, throwing himself into his part with old-time sincerity and enthusiasm, I begged to be introduced to him. He is one of the genuine old-timers whose work seems a part of them, clinging to their work with an "Until death do us part" sort of enthusiasm good to see. "I remember the days," said Mr. Bassett, "when one coat would go the rounds of the company, doing service at different times for each individual male member. It was, 'You lend me your tights to-night, John, and I'll lend you my coat.' If we had had the facilities in those days that we have to-day, I tell you we would have been doing something." Among the companies he has been with are "The Bonnie Briar Bush," with Stoddard starring; and where he played the part of the "Doctor"; "Merely Mary Ann," with Eleanor Robson; "Rip Van Winkle," and a long, long list of others, too long for me to remember. Mr. Bassett figures in one of the accompanying illustrations from "Let Us Smooth the Way."

On Saturday, September 23, the Nestor Film Co. will release a split comedy reel: "Mutt and Jeff" and another comedy in one reel. There will be also a regular series of scientific subjects gotten out in the near future. Mr. Fahrney, who made a slight study of surgery when in the army, proposes getting out some films on scientific surgery—experimenting with X-rays, etc.

Mr. D. Worth-While Horsley,
147 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Dear sir:

Just a word in acknowledgment of my appreciation of your excellent films, because, when a company is earnestly endeavoring to furnish its patrons with films that are really worth while" it is also worth-while on the part of the operators and exhibitors to "project" the full force of their sympathy, appreciation and co-operation upon the curtain of such endeavors.

Personally I have learned to cease my worry when "Nestors" are on my program; and, as the inimitable Mutt would say, "Everybody butta sure nuff boob has gotta have 'em."

Yours for excellence,
W. H. CUZNER, Crown Theater.

Mr. David Horsley,
New York, N. Y.

Dear sir:

"Mutt and Jeff" have broken all records for attendance at this popular place of amusement.

We have had many special releases including "Buffalo Jones Lassoing Wild Animals," "Automobile Race," fight pictures, "Cheyenne Cowboy Celebration," etc., but "Mutt and Jeff," which we receive from the Miles Bros.' Los Angeles office, have reached a record which we think will never be equalled in this theater.

Taking into consideration that these films were used during the hottest days in August, we feel more than justified in sending our best wishes to the Nestor people for their successful pictures.

Hoping to receive some more "Mutt and Jeff" pictures at an early date, we are,

Yours very truly,
Hogan & Jensen,
Proprietors of Isis Theater.

THANHOUSER'S "HONEYMOONERS"

A very excellent comedy picture entitled "The Honeymooners," was exhibited at the Sales Company's offices on Wednesday. The picture is intensely amusing—so much so that even the operator shook with laughter while he worked. It treats of a young couple who have just been married. The opening scene shows them receiving the congratulations of their friends. Meantime the carriage which is to convey them to the depot drives up to the door, bedecked most profusely with wreaths of flowers and a quantity of white ribbon. The two are panic-stricken at the idea of so much publicity, and straightway scheme to outwit their friends by each taking separate autos to the depot. The bride gets away successfully without anyone being the wiser, but the groom, not being as fortunate, is pelted with confetti and rice. However, he succeeds in getting a taxi and is soon on his way to the depot to meet his bride. Cruel Fate, however, intervenes, for the auto in which he has taken flight breaks down. The bride gets on the train and is whisked away down the tracks just as he is about to put his foot on the step of the car. She has no money, and is put off the train when not far out from the town. She starts to walk back, tires and sits down.

He, meantime, has caught another train, which is stopped on account of a freight train wreck ahead. The wreck is actually shown, the righting of the huge locomotive, etc., which is very interesting and edifying. At last the track is cleared for the passenger train and it goes on its way. They pass the bride sitting on the side of the bank, with her little white dog in her lap and her grip at her side. The groom, seeing her, rings the conductor's bell, which of course stops the train. He jumps off the end car, and is seen embracing his bride on the roadside. The last that is seen of them they are whizzing along the track on the back of a hand-car, dog, valises and all.

FROM THE OBSERVATORY

By G. F. Blaisdell

Beulah Binford will not pose for moving pictures, according to the latest information. It is well. There never was any decent reason why she should. The only losers by this non-action will be the men who would prostitute an industry that should be above suspicion and also, of course, the girl herself. Her position is pathetic. Deluded into coming to New York through the belief that she was going to make some good money, she now finds all doors closed against her. Theater managers who were to put her on their stages in vaudeville have telegraphed the booking agent that they have changed their minds. The National Board of Censorship has announced its flat disapproval of the projection of any films showing Miss Binford in any guise. The supervisory authorities in other cities have given notice that Binford pictures will be barred.

* * * *

All of which is a healthy indication that stage ethics are improving in tone. A dozen years ago the appearance before the footlights of a notorious person would have excited no comment. It was simply what was expected. No one had the hardihood to protest in any effectual manner. That vaudeville managers now are throwing up their hands demonstrates that the forces put in motion by "legitimate" theater men intended to hamper and discourage the increasing popularity of pictures have rolled back upon their own heads. The public conscience has been aroused through the agitation against questionable films. It is but natural that the sentiment stimulated by so much discussion should have a restraining influence on theatrical men. Bless you, the theater-owner does not fear the public as such. He knows, and knows well, what his clientele will stand for. What he fears is the police authority. That is the point where public sentiment focuses and crystallizes.

* * * *

The Binford incident should mark a beginning in the effort to bring the morals of the stage up to the level of those imposed upon the screen. There is no sensible reason why license should be accorded the one and prohibition placed upon the other. It is in no retaliatory spirit that these things are said; it must be plain to every one that it is useless to conserve the morals of youth through the display of good pictures and at the same time sandwich in between these films vaudeville that is below the same high standard.

H. H. Claiborne, of the office of the clerk of the district Court of Omaha, Neb., and Probation Officer Bernstein are preparing plans for the formation of a city moving picture league for the children.

The scheme will be largely identified with the open school proposition, if the school should be opened for wider use, as well as with the various boys' clubs throughout the city.

To start with, moving picture exhibitions will be given in schools and churches and homes. The parent organization will buy the first moving picture outfit and will then encourage the idea of neighborhood clubs, which may want to buy machines.

Under the plan proposed, one or two suitable reels of films would be rented from the film agencies for a period of two weeks, for instance. During those two weeks, ten or fifteen gatherings could be entertained with the same films, the cost being apportioned to the various clubs.

The promoters believe that the halls of schools not provided with suitable assembly rooms would suffice for these entertainments.

Mr. Claiborne says that the Omaha public schools must be opened to the public. If they were not, he said some court action would be taken to compel them to be.

The Talesburg (Ill.) Register says that the Congregational Church has been rented by Professor Drake and that, beginning October 14th, he will display moving pictures through the winter.

According to a decision in Philadelphia, the display on Sunday of censored sacred, moral or comic moving pictures, although in a building arranged somewhat like a theater, is not within the meaning of a statute forbidding the opening or maintaining of any theater on Sunday.

According to the Manchester (N. H.) Union, Eagle Eye, proprietor of the Frankfort street tea and coffee store, has established a moving picture theater at Penacook, where he was formerly located. Eagle Eye plans to conduct a chain of theaters in different communities of the state.

If the eyesight of this man is as keen as his name would indicate, it is a safe bet that he will decline to exhibit pictures containing burlesque Indians.

Elmer H. Condy, of the Aubert Vaudeville and Motion Picture Show, of St. Louis, and Miss Eunla Parmalee, the pianist in his theater, were married recently. The bride declined to relinquish her work at the theater, and when, on the evening following the marriage, the newlyweds appeared at the theater, they were confronted by numerous facetious placards posted by their friends.

Through the explosion of acid used in developing films, Miles Brothers of San Francisco suffered $20,000 loss in an ensuing fire. Among the films destroyed were some of great historic value, one of which was made from pictures taken during the Spanish War. In attempting to save these James A. Sciaroni was painfully burned.

* * * *

A small crowd in a picture house in Hayes street, San Francisco, hurried for the exits when Ike Voorhies, the operator, had trouble with his projector. There were minor bruises. Voorhies was burned on the hands and face. The blaze was extinguished before the fire apparatus arrived.

* * * *

Augustus Snowhite, the operator at Russell's, Tenth street, Reading, Penn., sustained so severe an electric shock that the services of a physician were necessary to restore him to consciousness. As usual, the audience rushed to the door.

* * * *

An operator in a Logansport (Ind.) house laid a hot carbon near a film, on the night of September 1, and, quite naturally, things happened very shortly. There was a flash of flame and some smoke, and the audience got away to a good start. There were damaged millinery and clothing as a result; also some slight bruises. The operator is still alive, and maybe he will, if permitted to continue at the business, be more careful in the future.

On the same night, W. D. Snider, owner of the Air Dome Theater, of Harper, Kan., suffered an uninsured loss by fire of $500. The 500 spectators escaped uninjured.

Selig is engaged in making educational pictures of Indianapolis and of Cincinnati. The Commercial Club of Indianapolis and the Cincinnati Commercial Association are co-operating with the manufacturer.

* * * *

Strange what a strangle hold this picture business gets on some of us! If there be difficulties to be surmounted, promptly are they surmounted.

Frank Jones was a patient in the South Side Hospital at Kansas City, Mo. The clock struck nine. Now to some people that slight incident would have no particular significance. But to many of us it signalizes the beginning of the last run of reels for the night. So it appealed to Farmer Frank. To be sure, he was garbed in his underclothes, the nurse having removed his outer garments to some inaccessible place, not necessarily for the safe-keeping of the aforesaid garments, but presumably necessarily for the safe-keeping of Frank. But Frank fooled the nurse. He did more than that. He amazed such of the populace as happened to be at large in the immediate neighborhood at that late hour. Clad in the habiliments which the usually thoughtful nurse had in an unusually thoughtless moment permitted to remain with him, Frank started north on a run, seeking the nearest picture show. Far be it from this writer to suggest that the average policeman is an artless soul, but there's one in Kansas City who has an artless soul; at least he has no soul for art. The marathon for educational films was rudely interrupted; the farmer was conveyed in a blanket and convoyed by the vigilant guardian of the peace to the General Hospital, preparatory to his decorous return to the South Side institution on the day following.

All of which suggests a thought; or perhaps two thoughts: Wasn't it nice of the nurse to leave Frank his underclothes? How much more comfortable is he that is arrayed in a blanket than he that is garbed in a barrel?

The New York Evening World on September 4 printed a romantic story of an elopement of Thomas Hopkinson, treasurer of the Manhattan Slide and Film Company, of 124 East Fourteenth street, New York, and Miss Sadie Harris, secretary of the firm. It printed this telegram, which had been received at the office of the concern:

"Your treasurer and secretary have eloped. Please wire $200 to the Jefferson Hotel, Los Angeles, Cal. Will be back when our honeymoon is over. Hoppy."

* * * * *

The story in circumstantial sequence described how the elopement resulted from the objections of the bride's father; also how Miss Harris had been spending her week-ends at the home of the Hopkinsons, and that the ceremony was performed at the church at Suffern, N. Y., where the Hopkinsons attend.

On the day following the couple arrived at the office of the firm at their accustomed hours, and were amazed at the congratulations showered on them, so the Evening World explained that afternoon. It seems that Miss Harris had not been at Suffern, but at Spring Valley, for her holiday, and that Hopkinson was at home. The latter was busy that evening explaining to his fiancee that some practical joker had put up a job on him.

The Evening World of Wednesday was still denying the elopement, and by way of appeasing the wrath of Miss Harris printed her picture.

Mr. Hopkinson, it may be unnecessary to state, is gunning for the poor joker who framed the job.

Here's hoping he finds him and gives him his deserts.

In Milwaukee G. Bruet is building a $10,000 house at Third and Chambers streets, and the Kosciusko Theater Company is spending the same amount on a house at Fifth avenue and Mitchell street.

From Our Western Correspondent

Hot Springs, Ark., Sept. 12.—Remember the old cry, "Lo, the poor Indian?" Permit me to substitute the following: "Lo, the poor widow." "Yes, it's me." "Sod?" you ask. "Laws, no—grass; I'm deserted." "The Man in the Baths" has hied him away to the theater at Whittington Park, where he and twenty-six other young men are rehearsing for a big minstrel show to be given on the night of the day this will be published. Whittington Park's season closes next Saturday night, and on Friday evening the big minstrel show takes place. "The Man in the Baths" has been selected to do the interlocutor, and this being "Moving Picture News Day," as he slangily put it, it's "up to me" to provide the weekly review of amusement events in this city.

Last week's letter, I believe, detailed the history, so far as Hot Springs was concerned, of the moving pictures of this resort. They were such a great disappointment, owing to the manner in which Imp cut and slashed them, that there is considerable talk among the moving picture men of getting a genuine reel of pictures of this city along the same lines as the "Beautiful Colorado" that Rex is about to release. In other words, they want a reel of 1,000 feet of film that will do the town justice. Little Rock had the Confederate reunion filmed, and we are awfully particular to see that the Capital City has nothing that Hot Springs cannot get; and the moving pictures of this resort, so far as a benefit for the town was concerned, were a great disappointment. There is one man in the city, whose name at present I am not at liberty to give, who has prepared an outline that has already met with the hearty endorsement of the city's most prominent business men, but the only thing that seems to put the traditional damper on the entehprise, is the fact that the previous reels may have spoiled a second release of the same subject. However, a little good advertising and I think that the former could easily be overcome. Wouldn't it be of some interest to the trade generally and the local residents in particular if Imp would come out with a statement as to just how that company managed to get the pictures it released on August 28. We've been doing a powerful lot of thinking, "Mr. and Mrs. Imp," so won't you please be so kind as to tell us why you only ran half of us?

Harry Hale, proprietor of the Lyric, caused to be announced the fact that he intends to build at the close of the coming winter season a new theater, having secured a twenty-year lease on the present site, which is part of the United States hotel, and would occupy all of that structure. The new house is to have a roof garden and a palatial theater on the first floor, contain all the modern improvements, and be a regular Broadway amusement affair. Mr. Hale has one of the best locations in the city, being situated directly opposite "Bath House Row," and the new theater is being awaited with pleasant anticipation.

The Princess is giving a wonderfully clever show, and one of the main reasons why it is successful is because they close the same with a good reel of Independent pictures. The past week the "Lineman," an Imp, and "The Cattle Rustler's End," one of the excellent American Western reels, held the curtain and were much enjoyed. The "headliner" was the Exposition Four, one of the best musical acts that has been seen in the city in months.

Moving pictures are making a lasting impression these days. For instance, Eddie Gavrel, proprietor of the Lyceum, had on exhibition there Selig's vivid reel, "The Land of the Esquimaux," and a friend of "The Man in the Bath" sent him a note for publication in the "New Era," of which he is the editor, stating that he wanted information as to the best way to keep from dreaming of the pictures he witnesses on the curtain, claiming that he went home after looking at the Selig reel of the frozen north and actually dreamed that he was a member of a polar relief expedition and was in the "land of the walrus." In his dream, he stated, he got very cold, and while asleep had gotten out of bed, put on his overcoat and was only awakened from his nocturnal experience and saved from really freezing to death when his wife slammed him in the ribs because he was pulling the blankets off the bed and wrapping them around himself. You see, he was dreaming that he had to have another blanket to keep him warm. "The Man in the Baths" created some amusement in this city when he published the letter and gave the necessary advice. He told the man that the best way to keep warm would be to take an electric heater to bed with him.

And now, Monsieur Blaisdell, a word to you, if the editor please. We thank you sincerely for your greeting, and, believing in social reciprocity, extend sincere felicitations. Furthermore, "The Man in the Baths" has requested me to extend to you a most hearty invitation, whenever you can find it convenient to do so, to pay Hot Springs a visit, and in said invitation I enter a most hearty "second the motion." We have been trying to get Mr. Saunders here for ever so long, but the nearest he gets to this place is Chicago, it seems. Perhaps you can some day in the near future accept this invitation to visit with us, acting as an advance agent to the "chief," assure him that everything here is O. K.; that this is a wonderful resort, and that the "bunch" my better half speaks of is all that he represented it to be. We are only sorry that the pictures that opened this pleasant little exchange between us did not materialize as negotiations led us to believe they would. But this disadvantage has realized the truth of the old law of compensation, has it not? We feel that as a result we are acquainted. Verily, "'tis a consummation devoutly to be wished."

During the week I looked at some very good pictures and one Pathe reel that was disgusting. Biograph's excellent pictures, "The Last Drop of Water," played a return engagement for the "steenth" time, but their "Rose of Kentucky" bloomed for the first time and was much appreciated. "The Venom of the Poppy" was one of the best human interest pictures of the week and for the same, Edison, we thank you very much. I want to state right here that Edison's leading lady is one of the most magnetic and clever little women before the camera and I always watch her work with interest. "The Auto Bug" made us laugh, but "The Working Girl's Success" was extremely silly. Lubin, we didn't like that one.

The Vitagraph Monthly was one of the best pictures of the week for general and varied interest, and its poster drew a big audience to the Lyceum Theater, where it was featured heavily. "My Old Dutch" was also much enjoyed. Pathe, however, should have been ashamed of their efforts in the "Love and Cheese" picture. It was so disgustingly suggestive, and Max didn't add one iota to his popularity in this city by that reel. In fact, it was just the reverse.

I note that Beulah Binford, the paramour of Henry Clay Beattie, Jr., convicted of the murder of his wife, is in New York to pose "for motion pictures." Don't you think, Mr. Editor, that's going a little too far? The good women of New York who are interested in amusements and the keeping clean of things that should be clean have protested against this girl going on the stage. Why must motion photography, for the sake of the "almighty dollar," stoop to her level? I like to believe that the greatest industry and amusement in the world to-day, the making of motion pictures, stands for all that is good and true in this life, and if Beulah Binford is not good enough for the American stage, she shouldn't be permitted to appear in motion pictures. There will be more little ones see her in the picture theaters than there would with an attraction or in vaudeville. I don't like to wish any manufacturer bad luck, but I sincerely hope that if she appears in any reel, that managers with a proper sense of decency will decline to order it from their exchange. And I'm not a "radical" in any sense of the word, either.

THE LADY IN THE BATHS.

WASHINGTON LETTER

Washington, D. C.—Ft. Myer is again being besieged by the Solax Company, under Director Melville and Mr. Lewis, to take part in its military dramas. It is the up-to-date tactics of these pictures that has given to this company its superiority in modern military photoplays. Captain Dean, of Ft. Myer, has been an able right-hand man in this enterprise, from the military as well as the dramatic side. When you meet him unceremoniously at the fort, this young and good-looking captain is a rather unpretentious individual, but he knows a "whole heap."

Romaine Fielding, the leading man of the Solax Company, has appeared frequently in the Washington theaters. It is his work in the past in intensely dramatic, legitimate dramas that has so well prepared him for the photoplay. He is just as courteous off the stage as on it, and he is quite an adept at cranking an auto.

* * * *

No one felt very joyous after the presentation of the films of "Dante's Inferno"; they weren't expected to, of course; but one young lady near me was positively afraid to go home after the show, while another said, "This reminds me of 'The Goblins Will Catch You, if You Don't Watch Out.'" The fact that Mr. Smithfield, who gives the remarks during the reels, has made a historical and literary study of the divine comedy and the instances therein has added much interest to his talk. The recitation of excerpts direct from the "Inferno" during the presentation of the pictures is very effective, and as Mr. Smithfield was connected with the dramatic stage before his bow as a lecturer, he knows how to do it.

* * * *

Tom Moore is back to his desk as busy as ever. He had a delightful trip and saw people connected with the moving picture industry at every turn, especially while in New York. His recently inaugurated Sunday concerts with motion pictures at the Gaiety and the Academy have begun with a dash. First run Independents are the photoplays, while his artists are select.

* * * *

The presentation of the motion picture travelogue of Alaska was thoroughly enjoyed at the Columbia Theater on Sunday last. A lecture supplementing this by Will T. Jones added much to the better understanding of the frozen North, its people, customs and industries. This forms one of the most educational sides of the animated camera.

Mr. Lewis Stone, Mr. L. L. Burns and Mr. D. Daniels have just returned from the Moquis reservation, where they have been for the past three weeks.

After surmounting considerable difficulties, and, with hard work to obtain special permits, they have succeeded in obtaining the only pictures of the Moquis tribe and their snake dance.

Thousands of Indians from all the surrounding territory visit this spot annually for the religious rites and medicine dances, and this is the first time in the history of the world, after considerable expenditure, that these Indians have been filmed while performing their religious fetes.

This only goes to show the progressiveness and aggressiveness of the Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. D. S. Markowitz, their president and general manager, has spared no expense nor effort to obtain all educational stories of any and all religious or educational features that could possibly be procured.

Only recently they have filmed the ground-breaking ceremonies and the high pontifical military mass which took place in San Diego. The proofs of these pictures were exhibited to a very critical audience composed of newspaper men and same have been pronounced a perfect piece of motiography. From an educational standpoint, these films have no equal.

The company are going ahead with their plans and in a very short time Mr. Markowitz will be on his way to New York with samples of some of their work, which will more than do justice and reward the manufacturers for their efforts.

Jury's Pictures, Ltd., are the latest people to go in for larger premises, and they are now installed in a really palatial building in St. Martin's Lane, within hail of their original quarters in Long Acre. Many developments are promised by this old established firm, including the production of a "film newspaper." One of the oldest members of the trade, Mr. Jury, has kept pace with modern developments in a remarkable fashion, and deserves all his success.

The railway strike is happily over, and business is resuming a normal course again. Some little dislocation was caused the trade, particularly by the troubles at Liverpool, where everybody practically seemed to be on strike and a state of anarchy reigned for a time. One of the American boats put out for the States again with all its cargo on board, having been unable to discharge it, and among that cargo there was a considerable quantity of film. Things are still very unsettled at Liverpool, many men of all classes refusing to go back to work until some corporation trainmen who were out are re-instated by the Council, and I was told a day or two ago that the Lusitania, also carrying a quantity of film subjects, was still waiting an opportunity to land its cargo. The chances of a general settlement are, however, undoubtedly more favorable now than for some time past.

ALL FILMS SOLD THROUGH THE SALES COMPANY

Truly, the Cine Theater will soon have no more fields to conquer. Here are the papers telling us of a company formed to establish a chain of theaters in China, of all places, and it is said with the approval of the Government and backed by money from the Mandarins of the Celestial Empire. Well, if the Chinese really wish to learn all they can of Western ideas, the kinematograph will take some beating as a means of instruction. If the almond-eyed nation really gets bitten with the picture craze, what a tremendous market is opened to the film producers! Shall we have studios established in China, to film the almost endless dramas in which the poeple are said to take such a delight?

It almost looks as though the makers were putting in a little preliminary work to enable them to cope with the lengthy subjects which will probably be demanded by Chinese taste, for we have had a plethora of two and three reels subjects lately, and I know of one maker who has gone one better, and has a 4,000-foot film on his shelves. Among these films "Martin Luther," "Ingomar" and "Salambo" are very ambitious stagings, indeed, and of the class of film which simply has to be taken by the renter, be its length what it may. The same remark applies to the Itala "Clio and Phyletes," which is reminiscent in parts of "The Fall of Troy," is a superb example of truthful and realistic staging, with some wonderful depth in some of the pictures.

By the way, is there anything in the rumor which reaches me that a prominent Continental maker is likely to spring a surprise on us in the way of color shortly?

Reverting to the Chinese matter, the statement already quoted reads strangely, indeed, and is a remarkable proof of the advance of ideas in the Chinese Empire, in view of the adventures of camera men who have attempted to take pictures in that country. It cannot be more than a year ago that Mr. McKenzie, of "Kinemacolor," told me that he had to abandon his camera in one of the Chinese towns and run for his life, owing to the menacing attitude of the crowd.

That the educational subject possesses ever-increasing attractions for the film manufacturers is evident by the number of these who are now releasing educational or semi-educational subjects. Not the least interesting of these releases is the series which Eclair are issuing showing submarine life and which give remarkably intimate studies of the many queer denizens of the deep.

Pasquale are already by way of justifying my prophecy that they were becoming a factor of some importance in the Continental trade; New Agency have just released a drama by this company which marks a still further advance in workmanship.

The odds on Johnson for his forthcoming match with Wells have shortened considerably since a public tryout by the latter, and interest in the picture which Barker's will take of the match is getting stronger in the trade. The general opinion now seems to be that it will, after all, be a fight worth going to see, and the result of which is still more or less in doubt, so that the pictures seem assured of success.

I paid a visit Thursday last to the studio of the "British & Colonial Co.," at Finchley, and if any one tells me after this that the home manufacturer lacks enterprise and is afraid of spending money on his productions, I shall decline to believe him. "B. & C." had a good seventy people in action for the camera that day, sailors, Arabs and negroes, the latter the genuine article, from one of the London theaters which is running an Oriental play. Moreover, some of the stage settings were most elaborate and cost money. The film in question is only one of a series of ambitious dramas which "B. & C." have handled this summer, and they have good people for their leading parts, and a producer in Mr. Dave Aylott, who knows his business thoroughly. With Cricks and Martin at Mitcham, Mr. Aylott produced a number of very big winners, including some of the "Muggins" headliners. "B. & C." have acquired an old country house with ample grounds, for their producing business and possess a flower garden and orchard which alone offer a wealth of pretty settings. B. A.

The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company will be ready to make delivery of the 1912 Model Single Motiograph Equipment about October 1st, and they will be pleased to give anyone interested full particulars.

The manager of this company reports to us that the demand for the Motiograph has been on the increase since the early spring of 1910, and their sales for August of 1911 were about equal with any one month in the history of their business, which covers a period of over thirteen years.

The Motiograph motion picture machine made its appearance on the market early in 1908; it has taken about two years to thoroughly demonstrate the extremely high quality of this machine, but now that the exhibitors have been convinced of the wonderful wearing qualities of this machine, and the operators are satisfied that it is the simplest machine to handle now on the market, the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company looks for an even greater increase in their sales than ever before. A visit to this company's plant will well repay anyone interested in this line of work.

This company is issuing a little booklet with illustrations entitled "The Making of the Motiograph," which they will be glad to mail free to anyone asking for same.

MOVING PICTURE BUSINESS ABROAD

England

(By Commercial Agent J. D. Whelpley)

There is a steady increase in the moving picture film business in England. The almost unanimous opinion among the big men in the trade is that there is still plenty of room for high-class films. Especially is this true of American films, which are by far the most popular in this country. The sales made here in March were the largest in the history of the industry and one American agent, who represents four of the principal film-making companies in the United States, disposed of more than 1,000,000 feet of films in Great Britain and Europe.

There seems to be nothing of the temporary boom about the moving picture business here. It has been estimated by reliable authorities that there are in England more than 2,000 theaters showing moving pictures exclusively, of which 300 are in London. Although new houses are being opened there are no signs that the promoters are doing more than meeting a very evident public demand.

Some of the larger syndicates in control of a considerable number of houses buy outright the films they use. The general practice, however, is for the film manufacturers to sell their products to agencies, which rent the films to the various theaters. In some cases after the films have been worn out they are returned to the makers under an agreement to that effect, but in the majority of cases they become the absolute property of the purchasers.

Although there are some houses in the heart of London that change their programs three and even four times a week, the general practice is two changes a week. It is believed that before long three changes a week will be general.

London a Center of Distribution—Competition

London has become a selling center for films for all parts of Europe and even Australia and New Zealand. Some of the American companies have opened offices in all the larger European centers, but it is here that competition is keenest. Some Italian manufacturers are energetic and enterprising and their products are the chief competitors of the American films. English films are not popular, even at home, and the subjects selected render them almost useless for sale in other countries, although they have a slight sale in Germany.

The keen competition has not resulted in much price cutting. Some of the English companies are said to be allowing a discount of 10 per cent, and a few of the American companies are thought to be doing the same. Some assert that prices will have a tendency to go up instead of down because of the increasing cost of producing high-class films, and that such an increase would not be resented by the picture-theater promoters. At the present time the demand is for a better film rather a cheaper one.

Some of the moving picture houses show a tendency to present programmes exclusively American, but such a course is probably unwise. In order to meet the wish for variety one French company turns out films under several names. Opinion is divided as to the advantage of such a course. Some of the continental companies are liberal in the matter of credit, but among the American companies the tendency is toward a cash business as far as possible.

Phases of cowboy and Indian life are the most popular subjects for American films. A strong flavor of melodrama is desirable, but there is no demand for immorality or vulgarity despite the attempts of some manufacturers to place films of a sensational character. The English audiences are quick to note any lack of taste in the dressing of the actors. Some objection has been raised to the more extreme American clothing of the male actors in some of the films. A keen interest is taken in the personalities of the several performers and any changes in the companies have their effect on the moving picture public here.

Germany

(From Consul-General Robert P. Skinner, Hamburg)

The censorship of moving pictures in Germany is not in any way related to the importation of films, which may be introduced upon payment of the duty of $47.60 per 100 kilos (220 pounds) regardless of the nature of the pictures themselves. After importation they become subject to police regulations, which vary in the different States in the Empire. In Hamburg there is no censorship prior to exhibition, but if the pictures are deemed to be of improper character by the police their withdrawal may be ordered by the police authorities. In Prussia censorship invariably precedes exhibition. As films are generally exhibited throughout the Empire, it is now the rule after importation at Hamburg to submit them to the Berlin censors before undertaking to exhibit them.

Scandalous pictures are never imported from the United States, and scenes of robbery and murder cannot be exhibited without previous elimination of objectionable parts. Merely sensational pictures are sometimes unable to secure official favor. The importation of American films at Hamburg is increasing.

Moving Picture Theaters in Coburg

(From Consul-General Frank Dillingham, Coburg)

The moving picture show in Coburg, known as "Cinematograph," has evidently proved a profitable investment, because the only two cinematograph theaters here have recently moved into larger halls fitted especially for this business. The new theaters seat several hundred people and are thoroughly up to date. Prices range from 5 to 10 cents, with half prices for children, students and soldiers. The cinematograph theaters are open from 4 p. m. until 11 p. m. on week days and on Sundays from 2 p. m. to 11 p. m. Sunday is usually the best day.

The program is changed every Wednesday and Saturday and generally consists of eight or nine numbers. Each program lasts from one and a half to two hours and starts with a picture of scenery in natural colors. That is followed by a drama, then comes a comedy, and the fourth number often includes descriptive scenes of some article in the course of manufacture, or the cultivation of flowers, or raising of chickens, snails, etc., for market. American pictures of cavalry sham battles, train wrecks, fires, etc., are in great favor here.

Each program, as a rule, includes one American film, which is always liked because the characters act naturally. The films are not selected by the proprietor of the theaters in Coburg, but are chosen and sent by a Berlin agent. Perhaps this explains why so few American films are given, because they are always favorites.

American films are shown in Coburg within ten days after their arrival in Germany. The films of the various companies vary in length from 240 to 2,700 feet, and the latest fad is to have one of the longest in each program, usually depicting some phase of life in a large city. Some of the most popular given in Coburg were played by actors of the Royal Theater of Copenhagen. Comedy films are usually German, Italian or French. Dramas are generally French or Italian, and scenery pictures are usually of Italian make.

The cinematograph machines are run by electricity, which is also used to run the mechanical piano and to light the theater. A large phonograph is used during the brief intermissions to hold the attention of the audience, and a piano is used as an accompaniment for the pictures.

The price quoted for a film 1,017 feet long is $73.78; for a film 1,033 feet long, $74.97, this being equal to 1 mark ($0.238) per meter (3.28 feet), prices being inclusive of "virage."

FOREIGN TRADE OPPORTUNITIES

STRICT RULES GOVERN MOVING PICTURE THEATERS

Philadelphia regulations regarding the erection of moving picture theaters and alterations of existing buildings for such exhibitions are so strict that the likelihood is minimized of a repetition in this city of the moving picture theater panic in Canonsburg, in which twenty-six persons lost their lives.

It has only been in the last three or four years that this city has had strict regulations regarding these structures. The regulations of the bureau of building inspection absolutely prohibit the erection of any moving picture theater or the altering of a present building for this purpose when the auditorium is to be above the ground floor. If by chance there should be a fire in a moving picture theater when it is on the ground floor, the patrons have at least a chance to escape through one of the exits provided by law.

Before these rules went into effect there were already some moving picture places on a second floor, such as the establishment above the Keystone market house, at Third street and Girard avenue. The places already established do not come under the jurisdiction of the bureau of building inspection, but every year are licensed by the board created for this purpose, which is composed of the chief of the electrical bureau and the chief fire marshal. This board has the power to refuse renewal of licenses for moving picture exhibitions which are held in the second floor of a building.

Moving Picture Regulations

Chief Edwin Clark, in speaking of the rules regarding the erection of moving picture theaters, said:

"There are many persons who seem to believe that the laws regarding the erection of moving picture places are made so that they can be evaded. They do not realize that they are made and enforced only to safeguard the lives of the public, and being in a business that derives its profits entirely from the patronage of the public, they should be only too willing to obey the regulations prescribed by this bureau.

"Under our present laws, which were framed three or four years ago, a moving picture theater seating more than 250 persons must have two 5-foot exits in the front, and two 4-foot exits in the rear. A place seating fewer than 500 must have three 5-foot front exits and two 5-foot rear exits, and those seating up to 750 persons must have five 5-foot front exits and two 6-foot rear exits. Those seating more than 750 must be entirely fireproof.

Some Places Are Firetraps

"No matter how many are seated, every moving picture parlor built in the city of Philadelphia must be on the first floor. Those buildings in which the second or third floors are used for hall purposes, dwellings, apartment houses, tenement houses, schools or hotels, cannot have a moving picture exhibition on the first floor, because, in case of fire, the danger of a panic of those occupying the floors above is too great.

"As the purpose of this law is to protect the public, it should meet with the hearty support of all interested in the public welfare, and an individual who tries willfully to evade it should not receive the patronage of the public."

Despite the efforts of the Bureau of Building Inspection, there are numerous moving picture parlors in various sections of the city which are nothing more than firetraps.

That they exist is due to a great degree to the laxity of the Board in issuing licenses. It is a frequent occurrence for a man when getting a permit to build a moving picture theater to take an affidavit that he will not seat more than 500 persons, and after the place is finished to crowd 700 chairs in it.

F. W. SWETT

The Nicholas Power Company announce that they have engaged Mr. F. W. Swett to act as special representative. He will spend most of his time traveling, principally in the interests of Power's Cameragraph No. 6, which is enjoying unprecedented popularity not only in the United States, but in foreign fields as well, in fact, wherever moving pictures are shown.

Leaving the position of chief electrician of the Dominion Atlantic Railway & Steamship Company, of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, in 1906, he took charge of the Royal Opera House in Yarmouth and there gained his first experience with moving pictures. The pictures projected in this house soon became the standard by which others in that vicinity were judged.

Having in view a wider field of activity, Mr. Swett left there to take charge of the repair department of the F. J. Howard Film Exchange, of Boston, Mass. This gave him a thorough knowledge of the mechanical construction of the various makes of machines which he was called upon to repair and adjust.

The Southern Pacific Railway Company having added moving pictures to its publicity department, engaged Mr. Swett to travel throughout the country with Prof. James W. Erwin, the official lecturer of the company. In that position he had entire charge of the mechanical apparatus used by the lecturers for the company. After covering the United States, he went to England in 1909, and for five months with Prof. Erwin gave illustrated lectures at the Anglo-American Exposition, Earl's Court, London. At the close of the Exposition they made a tour of the English provincial cities.

Since his return to the United States, Mr. Swett has been devoting his entire time and attention to the motion picture machine business and is one of the best posted men on the mechanical construction of the various makes of American and European machines now on the market.

He is a member of Local No. 2 I. A. T. S. E., of Chicago. Not only is he an expert in the handling of machines, but he has the rare faculty of quickly imparting his knowledge to others, and, where an inclination is shown to raise the standard of their work, Mr. Swett is always glad to give the operators what knowledge and assistance he can. His electrical training is especially valuable in this connection.

We consider the Nicholas Power Company very fortunate in having secured his services and feel sure that he will materially increase the host of friends they already possess.

Chicago, Ill.—Stang & Mackie will erect a new $6,000 moving picture theater at 114 West Sixty-third street.

"THE CO-ED PROFESSOR"

Imp Release September 25

College pranks furnish material for amusing stories, and the circumventing of the faculty has taxed the inventive mind of many a student. In this case Professor Jenkins and his co-laborer, Miss Penelope Grim, keep a tight rein on their respective charges, owing to the proximity of the sexes. The young people resent this and decide to outwit the instructors.

The girls have prepared a little spread in the room occupied by the ringleaders in the scheme, and they cast about to devise ways and means to smuggle the young men into the apartment. One ingenious mind suggests hauling them up in a basket, and the idea is acted upon instanter.

A large basket and a strong rope are secured. The basket is lowered over the window ledge and the plan works admirably. The young men are hauled up in rapid succession but the return trip is made once too often, for the basket is sighted in midair by Professor Jenkins and he takes in the situation at a glance.

His advent into the room containing the hilarious party is like a bombshell, but the instructor proves to be a good fellow and enters into the spirit of the occasion with a zeal that is appreciated by the students.

Miss Prim, passing by the door, has her suspicions aroused. She enters but there is a complete metamorphosis, the young men secreting themselves, the professor being chucked under the couch. She exits not quite satisfied that all is well. The professor emerges from the escapade without being suspected and is hailed as a jolly good fellow by the students.

This is a beautiful scenic picture taken in the world famed dells of Wisconsin, showing the shady nooks, the wooded cliffs, and the splendid stretches of water, a panorama of picturesque islands, rocks and crooks in the stream.

"'TWEEN TWO LOVES"

Imp Release September 28

Grace is the pretty daughter of Farmer Howard. Her mother being dead, the affections of the father are centered in his only child and he idolizes her. They are almost inseparable companions, happy and contented. The daughter grows to womanhood and the father is not aware of the transition, regarding her as a child.

The farm hand, who is addicted to the drink habit, at last tries the patience of his employer and is discharged in disgrace. Ben Wagner, a clean cut young fellow, applies for work and is engaged. He is attentive to his duties and pleases the old farmer and the daughter.

It is the old, old story, ever new. The farm laborer loves Grace and she returns his affection. Ben goes about it honorably and asks the farmer for permission to marry his daughter. Then it dawns on Howard that Grace is a woman and that marriage is the natural sequence, but he cannot bear the idea of the parting. He is jealous of the love of the young man and forbids the marriage. Grace tries to prevail upon him to relent but the old man is stern and the scene is an affecting one. The result is natural. The young folks marry and leave the sorrowing farmer, alone and childless.

Fortune does not favor them. The husband is stricken while working in the fields and dies, leaving his wife and child in destitute circumstances. Widowed, she appeals to her father for assistance, but he has not forgotten and with unnatural anger he refuses to own her as his daughter or contribute to her support.

Leaving her child one day, she sets out to find work. Her dwelling catches fire during her absence but she returns in time to save her babe, making a desperate fight in the smoke and flames. The house is destroyed and she has no home.

Desolate and in despair as the last resort, she takes her child and sets out on foot for the home of her childhood. She arrives footsore and exhausted, and seats herself on the old familiar porch with her fretful baby. The old farmer is seated by the fireside, a soured disappointed man. He is thinking of the time when he was happy with his little daughter on his knee. Suddenly he hears the crying of an infant. It awakens pleasant memories. He listens and is then interested.

Going to the door, he sees a woman and a babe on the porch; she is evidently on the verge of collapse, and he gathers her in his arms and half carries the baby and mother into the house. Then he discovers that it is his daughter—the girl he discarded. He contemplates her for a moment and then—takes her in his arms. There is a happy reconciliation and the daughter and widow assumes her old place at the head of the household of the happy old farmer.

"BILL AS AN EXPRESS MESSENGER"

Lux Release, September 22

This is an exceedingly amusing comedy showing Bill seeking a position. He finally secures one as express messenger, where we see him pushing a tricycle express cart. The results we will leave to your imagination.

"THE STOLEN DIAMOND"

After toiling for many years, an old miner finds a very large diamond. His daughter's sweetheart and many other friends attend the celebration of his success, when the diamond is handed round for inspection. The sight of so much wealth overcomes one of the party who returns at dead of night, steals the diamond, takes it into the hills and buries it at the foot of a tree which he marks in order to recognize it again. The old miner's daughter has given her sweetheart early that day a scarf. Whilst embracing her the sweetheart drops it. It is snatched up by the diamond stealer who places it near the cabinet from which he extracted the valuable jewel. Consequently when he accuses the sweetheart of the theft, everybody, with the exception of his mistress, is forced to believe it. An old sheriff makes an examination of the cabinet and finds another clue in the shape of a knife which is known to belong to the accuser. It is easy for the innocent man to keep a level countenance, but when his knife is discovered the guilt shows itself upon the thief's face. He is finally driven at the point of a revolver to acknowledge his crime, and leads the sheriff to the spot where he has hidden the diamond. The same is restored to its rightful owner, who, as a compensation, gives his daughter in marriage to the lover who has been wrongfully accused.

"BILL AS A BILLPOSTER"

Lux Release September 15

Bill gets a job as a billposter. His zeal in placing his advertisements in every nook and cranny creates much merriment. He finally gets blown sky-high, but unlike Humpty-Dumpty, he soon gets put together again.

"HIS MANIA FOR COLLECTING ANTIQUES"

This is an excellent and original film which gives plenty of opportunities for the knock-about-comedy beloved of picture audiences.

He and she are engaged on a day's shopping when they espy a curiosity shop. He, who cannot resist the antique, immediately dashes in and commences to barter with the proprietor for a very handsome suit of armour which has captured his fancy. The price being agreed upon, the enthusiastic collector must needs have it tried on, and eventually resolves to walk home in it, covered by his overcoat from the gaze of the vulgar. Many amusing incidents take place as the result of the journey, for the suit of armor renders its wearer quite impervious to the assaults of those whose wrath he arouses on the way, and he is even victor in an exciting combat with a professional strong man. Arrived home, however, his exasperated wife, who has been much annoyed by his behavior, discovers that his head is still vulnerable, and consequently commences to belabor him with less consideration than vigor.

"OH! YOU STENOGRAPHER"

Solax Release September 20

John Glenn & Sons, brokers, employ Miss Pearl as stenographer. She immediately falls into high favor with the senior member of the firm. She is too clever to state the fact that she is engaged to a rough Westerner who has staked a claim in a rich mining district.

Very soon the two sons become deeply enamored, and a rivalry starts between the father and boys. Flowers, candy and lunches follow in quick succession. The father is soon put in the background. Finally one of the boys gets his brother in disgrace by means of a practical joke, and the older son thinks he is the favored suitor. About this time the Westerner arrives. Having struck a rich claim, he comes to claim his bride. She accepts him at once, and the Glenns are left without a stenographer, mortified and chagrined. They finally accept the situation and take the matter as a huge joke.

"NELLIE'S SOLDIER"

Solax Release, September 22

By allowing a gang of timber thieves to commit depredations, Sheriff Binn, of Viscera County, California, has been receiving a big rake-off. The Government finally sends a detachment of cavalry to eject the intruders. Sergeant Bell orders them to leave the reservation, which they do, vowing vengeance. Bell telegraphs the Department Commander requesting authority to arrest the Sheriff. The telegraph operator, Nellie Mason, whom the Sergeant fell in love with while en route to the timber camp, is sending the message when the Sheriff and his gang of fellows enter, insult Bell, and in the scuffle which follows a pistol is discharged, killing a bystander. Nellie persuades Bell to flee, and when she hears of the Sheriff's intention to falsely accuse Bell of the murder, she follows and hides him in an old deserted cabin in the mountains. She then wires the Department Commander to hurry the authority for the arrest of the Sheriff, which she finally receives and notifies the troops, who arrive just in time to save her and her lover from being killed in the deserted cabin by the outlaw Sheriff and his gang of desperadoes.

"THE ROSE AND THE DAGGER"

Rex Release September 21

Since Eve paid her first month's rent in the Garden of Eden, woman's wills and wiles have also meant her way. In peace and in war, with these formidable weapons of femininity she has conquered masculine strength and firmness. The flash of bright eyes, the invitation of red lips, the sensitive appeal of soft, white arms—for these saints have sold their souls, men have bartered eternity. For a smile men have forfeited gold and glory; the mighty have fallen and the weak perished. The Cleopatra stunt has been encored through the ages, and the curtain will not ring down until the lights are out and the music is hushed and the Great Theater of the World is empty forever.

Rosita and Emanuel, two lovers returning from a ball, are overtaken by a storm. Emanuel leaves her in the shelter of an old castle while he goes to seek better protection. The castle is the refuge of a notorious bandit, Ronaldo, to which he comes while Rosita is awaiting the return of Emanuel. He sees Rosita and advances upon her with his dagger to obtain her jewels. Rosita exerts all her wiles and coquetry to divert his mind until Emanuel should return. She flirts and dances, and her beauty and grace at last arouse Ronaldo's passion. Dagger and jewels are forgotten; it is now the woman that he desires. She dances—and the exotic spell is on him. She dances—and the old drama of weak woman's power and strong man's weakness is again enacted. He tries to kiss her, but she dances off and around him, her great, gray eyes fastened upon him, tantalizing him to heated frenzy, while by clever manoeuvres she strives to obtain possession of the dagger at his belt. At last she permits Ronaldo, who has almost lost his senses from the furious rage of his futile passion, to button her shoes—the tigress preparing for her prey. With a dexterous, swift down-sweep of her arm she grasps the dagger and is about to plunge it into his heart when a bolt of lightning strikes him and Divine murder accomplishes her purpose. As she stands, awed by the swift and fatal blow from the hand of Providence, Emanuel returns, and she leaves the castle and its memory behind.

"LOCHINVAR"

Thanhouser Release September 26

Sir Walter Scott has given the world many heroes, but the one who will live the longest is Young Lochinvar, "who came out of the West." For Lochinvar was one of those heroes who, when he saw what he wanted, went and got it, and did not bother asking anyone to help him. He was self-reliant and energetic, and it is not strange that the "fair Ellen" loved him or that her kinsmen hated him.

The poem tells how "the fair Ellen" was forced by her parents to consent to marry a man so despicable and generally valueless that he is not even given a name. He is simply described as "a dastard in love, and a laggard in war," and it is not remarkable that the fair Ellen objected as vigorously as possible.

When Young Lochinvar heard the news, he started "all alone" for the home of the fair Ellen, and arrived just as the wedding was about to be celebrated. The Netherby clan, kinsmen of the bride, seeing that he had no followers, were disposed to be on the aggressive, but Lochinvar told them that "Now I am come, with this lost love of mine, to dance but one measure, drink one cup of wine." This seemed an easy way to prevent trouble, and the bride's father agreed. During the dance Lochinvar managed to explain to the girl that his horse was outside, and asked her to elope with him. She took one more look at "the dastard in love," who was not an inspiring spectacle, and consented. Then the couple danced to the door, and out, leaped on the horse and sped away before the Netherby clan realized what had happened. And they never saw the "fair Ellen" again for she became the happy bride of Lochinvar. History does not tell what happened to the "dastard" who was tricked out of a bride at the very altar. The chances are that he was exceedingly unpopular in his neighborhood, unless he made that a foreign one.

"LOVE'S SACRIFICE"

Thanhouser Release September 29

A middle-aged scientist, on a vacation in the country, meets and falls in love with a young girl, the only daughter of a widow who is an invalid. The widow, knowing that her life is near an end, hopes to see her daughter settled happily before she dies, and heartily approves of the scientist. Partly because of her mother's advice the girl consents to marry, and the ceremony is performed while the invalid is on her deathbed.

In her new home the girl is happy but finds that her life is a lonely one. Her husband is wrapped up in his profession, and while he loves his wife dearly, she is not all in all in the world to him, and sometimes she feels that she is neglected.

So she welcomes the appearance of a young man, son of one of her husband's old friends, and on his part the acquaintance speedily ripens into love. The wife is too innocent to realize it, the husband immersed in his studies, does not know it, and the only person who sees that the couple are in danger is a faithful old servant of the scientist.

This man finally determines to call the husband's attention to affairs. While the young people are in the garden he induces the scientist to look out of the window. The husband sees his wife apparently being embraced by the son of his old friend.

He drops the curtain with a groan. Had he waited a moment he would have seen that his wife indignantly spurned the attention of the man, and ordered him from the place, never to return. But all that the husband saw was what seemed to convince him that his girl wife loved another, a younger and handsomer man.

Then he considered what to do. Humbly he decided that perhaps the mistake was his own, and that the wife's happiness must be secured in such a manner that his death would seem to be a natural one, and so that the wife, without scandal, could wed the man he thought she loved.

So he tells the wife that he is going abroad on business, and she does not suspect anything. But later the old servant receives a letter from his master telling him he has deliberately gone to a section of the tropics which is practically death for white men, and that he hopes and indeed knows that he will never return.

The servant is warned that the wife must never know, but his tears give an inkling of his secret. Finally she sees the letter, and is horror-stricken at the error of her husband. Losing no time she posts after him, finds him sick and apparently dying, and convinces him that the only man she does love or ever did love is himself.

Joy aids in his recovery, and in time he is able to return home with the faithful wife who had nursed him back to health. Each saw that they had been somewhat to blame, and that too much science is sometimes as bad as too much flirtation. So they adapted themselves to each other's ways and went through life as partners without secrets from each other or misunderstandings.

"THE SHERIFF'S BROTHER"

Bison Release September 19

John Stockton, the sheriff, and his brother, Frank, are in love with Anna, and Frank wins her hand. Frank and his bride are in their new home, and he sets his rifle up against the wall. It slips to the ground and is discharged, killing the woman. Knowing the impulsiveness of the westerners, especially in a case where a woman's death is concerned, Frank hides in the hills, leaving a note telling of the accident. The mob starts in pursuit, but the sheriff, fearing a lynching, holds them back and himself goes after his brother and brings him back. Frank is protected and is given a fair trial, in which he is exonerated.

"THE MISSIONARY'S GRATITUDE"

Bison Release September 22

Sensational Indian Story

While paddling in the lake the Missionary's canoe upsets and he is rescued from drowning by New Moccasin, a Cheyenne who has just escaped from the Sioux after a thrilling fight. The Sioux recapture New Moccasin, and the Missionary pleads in vain for his rescuer's life. New Moccasin is tied to the stake to await death by torture. Slender Pine is moved to compassion by the Missionary's eloquence and falls in love with the captive. She manages to cut his bonds, and the three escape and finally outdistance the pursuers. The lovers are married by the Missionary and go back into the wild woods to set up their new home.

"TWEEDLEDUM'S RIDING BOOTS"

Ambrosio Release September 20

Tweedledum goes riding with his lady love, but being a poor horseman and also hampered by a new pair of long boots, he has many amusing mishaps, and is finally unseated at a fence. Returning home the boots give him some more trouble, and the climax is reached when he receives a note from the girl saying she has no use for such a poor horseman.

On the same reel is "Tiny Tom as a Detective." The diminutive hero proves his worth as a detective and recovers a large sum of stolen money. His small stature enables him to follow the culprits, hiding in places impossible for a larger man.

"THE BLACK HORSE TROOP OF CULVER"

Champion Release September 25

At Culver, Ind., is to be found an institution of learning and military training that is unsurpassed in this country as regards private schools of this character. The scholars come from all over the United States and represent the best blood of the nation, the school's enrollment showing the names of numerous scions of distinguished American ancestry.

To see this troop of horsemen in their daring riding feats is to set one's blood on fire with admiration for their pluck, skill and brains which they bring into their work. Colonel E. A. Stewart, the soldierly and dignified head of the institution, magnanimously and courteously extended every facility to The Champion Company to film the evolutions of the Black Horse Cavalry, and thereby give its patrons an exhibition of the finest horsemanship in the United States.

In the telling, it is almost unbelievable what these youths can perform on horseback, either in the saddle or bareback. Vaulting on and off the horses going at full speed; forming pyramids three high while the chargers madly gallop; making intricate evolutions in spiral, circular and oblique movements; these are but a few of the many daring and hair-raising feats which The Champion camera caught.

This picture is an educational film of high value, for it brings to the view of hundreds of thousands of Americans, young and old, one of the great institutions of the land, the existence of which they were in ignorance. Besides it will serve as an inspiration and incentive to the American youth in his efforts to obtain a degree of perfection in body and mind as an aid in coping with the physical and moral barriers that may arise in the battle of life.

"THE COOK OF THE RANCH"

Champion Release September 27

A cowboy falls in love with the buxom cook of the ranch, but the cook pretended to make merry of his tender sentiments. That started the fun. Filled with a spirit of harmless mischief, the cowboy scrawled a note to the cook, asking for a tryst. He then sent a similar note to "a haythin Chinee" who worked about the place. He then notified the foreman, by note, to be on hand to help along the merry ha! ha! at the cook's expense.

Well, you may imagine what happened when China and "ould Ireland" met. Then the cook was on the warpath for fair.

But the joke was causing the foreman to so split his sides that he had to share it with the ranch owner, who in a convulsive fit had to tell his wife. She, hysterically, unloaded it on the maid. The maid, a young Indian girl, forgot her bringing up, and he-he'd and he-he'd until the daughter was informed. She in turn doubled up like a jack-knife and had to disgorge the secret to her sister.

The cook, coming in unexpectedly, overheard how she had been tricked. Throwing down the smoking turkey she was carrying in, she seized a rolling pin and butcher knife and set out to trail the cowboy. As stout as the cook, so was the cowboy. Land sakes! What a chase they had. But thank Heaven! the cowboy escaped her wrath, butcher knife and rolling pin.

Meanwhile there was no dinner. And every one had laughed so much that they were monstrously hungry. Then an appeal was made to the cowboy, and he appealed to the cook, telling her how madly and jealously he loved her, and that was why he had acted as he had done. The love potion was effective, and the cook soon assuaged the hunger of the ranch owner and all hands. A bow-wow of a laugh and a breeze of a Western comedy.

"CAUGHT IN HIS OWN NET"

Great Northern Release September 23

A pretty farmyard scene opens this subject. The farmer's daughter has two admirers, one a farm laborer employed by her father, and the other a young neighbor farmer of good financial standing. The father is in arrears with his rent, and the rich young suitor to his daughter offers to get him out of the difficulty providing he will give him his daughter's hand in marriage. The father consents, but the girl soon shows her objection, preferring the love of the laborer. The rejected suitor in anger enters the farmer's barn intent upon revenge, and accidentally sets fire to the structure. He tries to throw suspicion upon the farmer, but two tramps point out the real culprit, having seen him enter the barn. The young laborer re-enters the employ of the farmer, whom he assists financially with the winnings of a large lottery prize, and later marries the daughter.

"ACROSS THE DIVIDE"

Nestor Release, September 20

If she could only get John to sign the pledge—what a happy little family they would be, and Mary glanced to where her husband stood kissing their two rosy children goodbye. She would plead with him that very night. Unfortunately, however, ere night fell, John, at Lem Bassett's invitation, had stopped in at Murphy's saloon to have "just one," but had nevertheless reached the quarry in such a condition that the foreman had promptly discharged him, greatly to Lem's satisfaction.

The remainder of the day John spent in the saloon, but getting into an argument toward evening, the bartender unceremoniously threw him outside, just as his supposed friend was returning from work. Picking John up, Lem helped him to his home, where, as soon as Lem was left alone with the young wife, he attempted to embrace her. Hearing her cry of surprise and indignation, the husband returned.

Mary, unmindful of his condition, stepped between them, but John pushed her aside—more forcibly than he realized—for she fell, striking her head on the table, and lay unconscious. Believing her dead, as did John, when he tried to revive her, Lem made for the door, closely followed by the now sobered and frantic husband. On and on they ran, until the pursued man reached the cliff. There a desperate battle was fought, ending in Lem losing his balance, and falling over the cliff.

Filled with horror at what he had unconsciously done, John fled the state. In the struggle, however, his coat had been thrown aside, so that two prospectors, finding it six months later, sorrowfully came to the now fully recovered Mary, with the news that her husband had fallen over the cliff.

Fifteen years passed; John, who had become "a gentleman of fortune," was lying in wait for the stage coach, when his daughter, who, with her mother and brother had moved West, happened upon them. To protect her from his men, a quarrel arose in which John was wounded, but as the others ran off, the girl snatched off his mask and signaled the stage-coach for her "friend," and ere half an hour had passed the supposed dead husband and wife were happily united.

"MUTT AND JEFF AND THE DOG-CATCHERS"

Nestor Release September 23

This time Mutt and Jeff are not overprosperous (a financial state of affairs to which they are no strangers) and, as is their usual wont, they get busy devising ways and means to make an easy living—the easier the better.

Traveling organists have no difficulty in getting money; and as Mutt always was musically inclined, he undoubtedly could grind out the same quality and the same quantity of music that energetic Italian mountaineers regale us with. But what is organ music without a monkey? How to get a monkey, that's the question.

Mutt's think-box gets in motion. It takes more than a little persuasion on his part to get little Jeff to impersonate the much-needed monkey. Organist Mutt and collector-monk Jeff soon begin making noise and incidentally some money.

Business, however, does not meet with Mutt's most sanguine expectations, and of course he takes it out of the monkey. The dog catchers, a tender-hearted bunch, free Jeff from Mutt's brutal clutches and take him away with a motley assortment of stray dogs.

What does Mutt do without his monkey? What does Jeff do in the dog den? What do the dog catchers do? They cut up such a lot of uproariously funny monkeyshines as to keep both young and old doing the continuous laughing performance till the climax is reached.

On the same reel "Obliging a Friend." Kitty, the cook's, cup of joy was overflowing. This morning Bob Hanson, her pugilistic "steady," had at last kept his promise to give her a boxing lesson; and although tables and chairs had been overturned in the bout, Kitty was still radiantly happy until she discovered her master and mistress sprawling upon the floor, where they had been unintentionally knocked by the excited fighters, as they entered to ascertain the cause of the disturbance.

Then, despite the pleading of his wife, Mary, John ordered Kitty to pack her trunk, and strode off to the office to promptly forget his wife's parting instructions about sending home a cook at once.

At the close of the day, Mary called up and informed her husband that unless he returned with a cook, she would go home to mother. Hurriedly he rang up the employment office, but unfortunately all help had gone for the day.

In despair, John turned to Jack Wilber, who for the last half hour had been practicing with a Biddy's masquerade costume which he was to wear that evening, and insisted that to oblige a friend in such a sore need, Jack must go home with him that evening and concoct a few of the dishes about which he had bragged.

Under protest the young man was at last coaxed to take his place in the kitchen. All might have gone well had not Mary entered in time to see her husband fastening the new cook's dress. In tears the unhappy wife started for her room; John, however, quickly headed her off and was endeavoring to straighten things out when Kitty's voice again brought them to the kitchen.

Acting upon Bob's suggestion, Kitty had returned to get dinner, when she beheld her "steady" with his arms about the new servant. As husband and wife entered, the rolling-pin was descending vigorously upon Jack's head, and he, poor man, finding all other exits cut off, made a mad leap through the window. Then John beheld his obliging friend, Jack, minus the skirt, for Mary had snatched that as he passed, running at full speed, closely followed by the neighbor's dog and a howling mob.

"FOR THE WEARING OF THE GREEN"

Yankee Release, September 25th

Neil O'Connor, an Irish patriot, feared by the English and loved by the Irish, is compelled to seek refuge among the hills to avoid being captured and probably hung as a traitor.

Sir James Blackadder is anxious to see Neil O'Connor caught, as he is in love with Lady Broughton, who is the promised wife of O'Connor.

Sir James employs a notorious character, Red Rufus, to spy upon O'Connor and offers him a large reward if O'Connor is captured; but O'Connor has many friends, among them being Pike and Honora, two simple-hearted loyal Irish patriots who aid O'Connor throughout his forced exile.

When Sir James shows Lady Broughton a pardon for O'Connor and threatens to burn it up unless she becomes his wife, Honora manages to obtain the pardon, secretes it on her person and replaces same with another paper which Sir James burns.

When O'Connor is captured and brought before Sir James, who is about to commit him to jail in spite of the pleadings of Lady Broughton. Pike and Honora spoil this plan by producing the pardon.

"MAN"

Yankee Release, September 29th

"Know then thyself, presume not
God to scan;
The proper study for mankind is man."

—Pope.

Brute force in the prehistoric age was law, and he of the greatest strength inevitably obtained anything he desired.

When the daughter of the millionaire ironworker is saved from injury and possible death by one of her father's employees, she becomes interested in the gigantic and handsome specimen of manhood, who by sheer brutal strength, stops a maddened horse in his headlong flight. The young giant, besides possessing abnormal strength, has also a goodly share of brains which he utilizes to such good effect that he eventually becomes superintendent of the steel plant.

He learns to love the girl with a strong man's passion and, like his ancestors of the stone age, vows to make her his, in spite of all obstacles. The girl learns of his love and also of her power over this giant, and, womanlike, is pleased.

As a member of a spiritualistic society she comes in contact with one of the lecturers who loves her and of whom the young giant is jealous. When the young giant professes his love, she coquettishly runs from him and tells him to wait.

The professor of spiritualism and the young giant meet at the steel works and in a moment of jealous rage the instinct of the prehistoric man asserts itself, and he is about to throw the professor into the gaping furnace when an apparition appears of himself and the girl in the garb of the stone age locked in each other's arms. Again this apparition appears to the girl, who, being a spiritualist, realizes that she and the young giant had been mates in the stone age, and therefore should become mates in the civilized world.

The Champion Film Company will release on September 25th a film which was especially undertaken by one of its directors with camera men. "The Black Horse Troop of Culver" is the film title of an exclusive academy at Culver, Ind., that is looked upon with a favorable eye, and materially assisted by the United States War Department.

The troopers are mere lads, ranging in age from fifteen to twenty years. The marvelous horsemanship and feats of daring which they execute in their interesting military performances are accurate imitations of the work done by the best trained regular army cavalry.

It is quite an asset to topical motographic subjects, and "The Black Horse Troop of Culver" is undoubtedly a Champion film of merit.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Sydney Jacobson will leave this week for St. Louis to make arrangements for the placing of his invention of an exterior blurred image for projecting machines on the market. During his recent visit to New York, this device received favorable comment from all sides by the motion picture men, some of whom would wish to control the device. So well pleased was Mr. Miles with its possibilities that he is exhibiting the lens and the blurred reflection in his offices. Mr. Jacobson considers this the triumph of his visit.

The audiences at Schutzen Park are daily amused and often plunged into laughter at the "accidental slides" that supplement the reels at this pleasure resort. These are the work of Cortland Christiani, whose line sketches and a few terse remarks show the funny side of current events, familiar people, and future outlooks.

New York, N. Y.—Henry I. Feiser has plans for a new moving picture theater at Madison avenue and 102d street, to cost $12,000, for J. & C. Fischer.

CRITICISMS AND SUGGESTIONS

All our manufacturers and importers are bending every effort to improve their quality. You exhibitors come in close contact with the public and hear their criticisms. Won't you please write us whenever you have anything to say that will help us in improving the quality of future releases. We believe it is of good average quality now, but we want it better. Let us hear from you.
